A few months ago, one of the New Church Development Pastors in the Chicago area who has been in the field since 1963, quipped that New Church Development is the new form of masochism for ministers. Apart from the fact that this statement was made by one of our most competent men in one of his more paranoid moods, it reflects a condition being felt by many men in New Church Development in these days. There are two reasons for this: First, the climate which once gave new church development its romantic flavor has passed, and second, the methodology which we have come to know so well, and which some have referred to as the "pre-packaged plan" for the most part is no longer adequate. If we have to think in terms of a package we need to take off the wrappings, review the parts, and then use with a great deal of discretion. Whatever we do will have to be much more in the nature of a venture in faith and a design in sensitivity. For the world setting has changed, the church itself is changing, and those new points of ministry that we helped to bring to life under the label of New Church Development will have to be as new as the moment and as particularly conceived as the settings into which they are placed.

The former cliches are dull. The former stereotypes are deadening. Our once thought faithfulness is now being shown in the clear light of God's judgment upon the church, and our largely ghettoized suburban existence causes deep pangs of anxiety. For while Christ's prayer was for the unity of the Church, our efforts have largely been segregated geographically, economically, and ideologically and racially.

The point is that we are involved in a new reformation, and to go through this and be responsible or faithful is not easy. The demands are rigorous and the risks are many.

The past is well known to us. I don't need to review it. In capsule form it can be summarized by these phrases: Unprecedented growth in population and the population of religion. Households were formed between 1940 and 1965 at twice the rate they were from 1900 to 1940. The churches only had to place a man on the field and contact the local paper and the people came. Such was the flavor of our past, but not to be dismissed without one barb provided by a thoughtful writer in a recent periodical reflecting upon our past who said, "The church boom of the 50's disclosed the Church's shameless promiscuity, its willingness to entertain as many as could be seduced into joining, irrespective of faith or commitment." (1)

But it is the future to which we must look. And the present with which we have to deal now is in no small measure the proving ground for what the health and viability to say nothing of the faithfulness of the Church of tomorrow may be.

By way of looking to the future, we must reflect for a moment on the changes that are taking place now within the area for which we have responsibility. Each area has its own distinctiveness and the need for its own peculiar strategy. Yet there are also movements and conditions which are common to all our areas, movements and conditions in the real world with which we have tended to have too little vital contact and over which we have had inadequate perspective, movements and conditions which are calling upon the church in a real way to be what William Arthur, managing editor of Look Magazine, described his journal to be: "A joyful guest at reality's surprise party."

The movements and conditions to which I refer are heavily documented in various books, periodicals and papers. I shall not try to do more than point to them by way of listing them as paramount concerns which must provide the grist for the mill by which we grind out the goals and objectives for the work ahead of us in the next ten to fifteen years, goals and objectives which no doubt will change even within that period, but which must be set forth, clarified and refined, and then faithfully sought after to the extent of our human competence enabled by the grace that God may give us. Colin Williams so aptly put it, we have lived long with the symbols of witness and evangelism by which we have implied to the world that the church has the answers to life and the world must come to the church to find them, when in reality Christ is calling the church to turn out to the world, to listen, to be sensitive – and sensible – and then to join Christ there, to be present, remembering that there is in God's providence a time to be silent, a time to speak, a time to act, but never a time to be absent.

What then does all of this mean as we try to enunciate some goals for our efforts in the years ahead?

I believe that the following, if followed out and developed conscientiously, provide a basic goal structure.

To provide points of ministry responsive to the working of the Holy Spirit.

By this I mean that we must establish or renew our various ministries so that the Holy Spirit will be unfettered to work his purposes among God's people wherever they may be gathered to worship, to train, and to act.

To be free of traditional limitations to explore new forms of ministry.

The movements and conditions of our day cry out to us to make exploratory thrusts in ministry to occupational groupings, to points of leisure recreation, to issue-centered groupings, to disorganized communities, to low income communities and to many other points which you could name.

To make provision for a more disciplined church.

As already implied, much of the turmoil within the church today results from inadequate expectations from those who have joined and thus too little effective awakening of faith and commitment. We must provide some form of discipline to which people will commit themselves and thus know what is expected of them.

To provide adequate training for faith in action.

Here I focus upon adults and the need to emancipate our laymen to be the church in the world. Without saying more, this leads to the next goal –

To assure an outward orientation for every new ministry.

This is the natural product of training for faith in action. It requires a teaching pastor who sees his task as preparing his people to meet the world and function in it as faithful ministers. This assumes full pastoral responsibility but it emphasizes the teaching function. Such involvement in issues and movements provides the context within which true Christian education can take place. Training and involvement go together. They feed each other and build a wholeness of discipleship. Too long have we been content to believe that new churches must "mature" or get their "house in order" before they can begin to become involved with the life of the community. Nowhere is that lame excuse found in the New Testament.

To provide vital worship

Our worship must be alive to God's judging and gracious presence and it must be engaged in with expectancy. It can only be meaningful if pastor and people are engaged with their world in such a way as to know the need of their common forgiveness, their searching of the word, and their renewal through the Sacraments.

To resist the temptation to further pre-packaged approaches to new church development.

We have enough experience now to know, even if we are not ready to admit it, that stereotyped program structures, rigid financial patterns and automatic building expectations imposed upon a new congregation are detrimental to its spirit and its effectiveness. Certain procedures and methods may in fact be similar among a number of new fields, but to make requirements of these without adequate sensitivity to the uniqueness and the peculiar needs of each situation is in effect to kill where the spirit would breathe life.

To break out of our suburban segregation and turn back again to the city.

By this I do not mean to abandon the suburb, but rather to become inclusive. In recent years, judicatory structures have tended to encourage this segregation by having separate departments or committees for urban work and new church development. It is illogical to parallel a geographically and a functionally defined responsibility in one judicatory. Responsible judicatory planning in this day should make haste to dissolve such barriers and structures for inclusive ministry in city and suburban parts of the urban areas.

To provide personnel adequate for the task.

This is a truism except that I would urge a change in emphasis. Heretofore we have placed much more weight than was justified on a man's organizational ability. We wanted go-getters with all around abilities, but the go-getter qualities loomed large. I submit we need men who are theologically competent, able to teach, able to communicate, and able to work well with groups. For our need is not for organization, but for a community of people who know what it means to be the church and who know what they as God's people are to do.

Conscientiously to initiate joint new projects with other denominations.

The climate within which new church development of traditional or new forms is taking place indicates the futility of prolonging our separated competitiveness. There are many obstacles in the way, but the future requires that we wrestle with these obstacles and find the way through, just as it is being done on the national level. It makes little sense now to be continuing separately in developing new starts where we can be safe in assuming that in the relatively near future we will be united.

To engage established congregations in the process of new church development.

Operation spin-off immediately comes to mind. Certainly this is integral to our future efforts. For too long we have allowed congregationalism to penetrate our connectional efforts in new church work. New churches need neighboring support and established churches need the renewal that may come through responsible involvement in new church development.

Such a goal structure is never complete, never final, and always subject to debate. I believe, however, that to pursue such goals would enable us to bring to life ministries of the church which would have the quality suggested by George Todd. He speaks of the city but his words can well be a charge to the whole church.

1. "The church should be structured so that it is in touch with the people, institutions, issues, structures, events and crises of metropolitan life. It should be in a position to participate.
2. "The church is called not only to a role of listening, involvement and encounter in the city's life. Its mission is also to help the city gain a vision of what it is meant to be.
3. "Most important of all, the Church as a body of Christ is called to incarnate itself at the points where suffering and sin are most vividly manifest in the city. The Church is called to take into its own body through redemptive service the pain of the city...the crosses that are raised in the midst of the city's life." (2)

If you and I are serious about this business of new church development, no less a charge can be ours now, and in the future which we face together.

Dept. of National Priorities: The XB-70A research bomber that crashed June 8 over the Mojave Desert was one of two planes built at a cost of $1.2 billion. This sum is approximately as much money as the government will spend during 1966 on the anti-poverty program.

PASTOR'S COLUMN

Dr. T. W. Kirkman, Jr.
Pastor, 1st Presbyterian Church
Royal Oak, Michigan

In our country today, there is considerable emphasis upon the rights of the minority. We have a host of laws which forbid discrimination against almost every minority, and we protect the minorities' sensitivities in every way. Although the overwhelming majority of our people are religious, we cannot read the Bible in public schools because a small minority are atheists. Furthermore, we cannot send the atheist out of the room while the others listen to the Bible because this might make him feel inferior.

Minorities are not required to show good manners. Indeed, it sometimes seems as if the lack of good manners is a requirement if you are to be a successful minority. During the commencement addresses at which Vice-president Humphrey and Secretary of Defense McNamara were speaking, a small minority got up and walked out because they disapproved of the policies of our nation in Vietnam.

Now if the majority ever displayed the same lack of good taste and honesty to the minority that the minority shows the majority, the minority would find life intolerable. It is high time that the minority learns that minority status does not give them license to act in any way they desire.

What would happen if all the white people of our nation began to parade and to demonstrate in protest against the Negroes' high rate of crime and burdensome welfare costs? What would happen if every time someone in support of our nation's policies in Vietnam walked out when someone spoke against these policies? I am fearful that the orderliness of our nation would be overthrown.

In my judgment, the majority also has rights. I believe that it has the right to require certain things of minorities. I would suggest three areas in which the majority rightfully can make demands upon the minorities:

First, as a minority rightfully demands toleration from the majority, the majority can rightfully demand good manners from the minority. Being a minority is not an excuse to be obnoxious. Because you are a minority is no reason to behave in a barbarous way. All too often in our day, minorities have behaved obnoxiously in order to attract attention. I believe good manners are as much in order from the minority as they are from the majority.

Second, as a minority rightfully demands responsibility from the majority, the majority can rightfully expect responsibility from a minority. No society can long endure if individuals or power blocks refuse to be responsible for their actions. If a group creates a riot, it must be held responsible for the riot. Responsibility is the keystone of our republican form of government.

Third, as a minority rightfully demands that the majority be lawful, the majority can rightfully demand that the minority be lawful. Because you are a minority and do not like a particular law does not give you license to disobey it. If lawlessness becomes the order of the day, the minority has the most to lose since laws are designed to protect minorities.

It is high time that the minorities in our society understand that their minority status does not give them exemption from good manners, from responsibility, and from lawfulness.

A PRESBYTERY'S COMMISSION ON PUBLIC EDUCATION

Call to Involvement in Public Education

St. Matthew 19:14 – But Jesus said, "Let the children come to me, and do not hinder them; for to such belongs the kingdom of heaven."

To take responsibility of baptism seriously means that congregations must have a continuing concern for the whole being of the child. A good public education is one of the foundations for the the church's total ministry to children and youth. The church school's teaching efforts are weakened when there are deficiencies in the public education system. A weak public education system leaves a crippling gap in the child's total experience, and further attention reveals that the lack of adequate education frustrates any hope of economic security in adult life, diminishes a child's estimate of his personal worth, and deadens his sense of hope for the future. This basic injustice to children, whether within or without the congregation, is a vital concern of the church.

We commend the efforts of all pastors and people who have attempted to deal responsibly with the crisis in education within the city. The crisis is not confined to that area of metropolis known as the "Inner City", but rather the crisis in education has implications for the entire society and needs the creative witness of the whole church.

The Commission on Public Education calls upon every congregation to give immediate continuing and comprehensive attention to the public education system of the local community, the metropolitan area, the State and the nation.

The Commission on Public Education strongly urges the following:

1. That every Session appoint a responsible body, a special or existing committee, to give major time to an analysis of existing conditions in public education, to mobilize resources to affirm or improve the system, to direct the attention of congregations to full exploration of issues in public education (such as shared time, supplementary education, integration and adequate financing), and to develop appropriate methods for participating in decisions concerning the future of public education.

2. That this church committee attempt to put into action some of these specifics:

a. Get acquainted with teachers, principals and superintendents in the area
b. Invite them into homes of the congregation if possible and mutually convenient
c. Convene all the people in the congregation related to education – administrators, teachers, school board members, PTA leaders, county commissioners – to consider the current situation in public education
d. Analyze the racial enrollment of public schools and support civil rights leaders and community organizations in working to integrate schools.
e. Inquire about the rate and causes of school drop outs in the area.
f. Talk to young people about the dignity and high calling of the teaching profession. Encourage them to be willing and challenged to work in difficult schools.
g. Prepare for integration of your community and its schools.
h. Enlist people to attend Board of Education meetings with some regularity and get information about them to the congregation—more accurate than TV and newspaper reports.
i. Join with other churches in having a special superintendents' recognition service for teachers, principals in the area—perhaps in the Fall when school starts or at the end of the year.
j. Urge volunteers to aid in tutorial programs in underprivileged areas. Church committee could act as the clearing house—matching people to the specific needs.
k. If the local school administration permits, encourage people with talent and extraordinary backgrounds to offer services to enrich school program.
l. Give thought to ways of assisting segregated suburban schools to enjoy the benefits of "integrated education".

3. That churches send to the Commission on Public Education descriptions of action taken, or things they are now doing or planning to do in their involvement in the problems of education.

MIAMI REPORT - 1966 FALL

Dr. Gaspar Langella

One of the main issues confronting the Church in Miami is how to intervene creatively, as a factor of integration and reconciliation, in a community in conflict. The issue is complicated by the fact that the Church shares in the power order of the community and therefore is subject to the temptation of trying to buy a clear conscience through service organizations while still enjoying unshared privilege.

The drama developing in Miami reaches beyond the common problems of the central city versus the suburbs or the tasks and perplexities of urban renewal. The fact that Cubans-in-exile represent twenty percent of the urban population and that they are competing, job- and housing-wise, with the Negroes who are recent rural newcomers to the City, has profoundly changed an economy and a community which had in the recent past a fairly stable equilibrium. The relative financial success of the Cubans, in spite of its effect of reducing the seasonal character of the local economy, increases the pervasive sense of powerlessness and marginality felt by the Negroes. The issue is to be seen in relation to the problem of minorities in American urban life. This is really the focus of the issue in Miami which has become today the gateway of Latin America into the United States, thus repeating the pattern established by New York and other major eastern cities in the past.

The idea of America as a melting pot in which all races and cultures merged and fused is essentially based on the experience of the Europeans who emigrated to this country in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Cultural differences were gradually submerged, and the newcomers were successfully absorbed into the American fabric. This process took place mainly in the larger cities so that the stereotype of America as a melting pot was, in reality, drawn from what happened in those cities.

The assimilation process which characterized the European immigrants in America followed a rather fixed pattern. The newly arrived immigrants responded to the confusion and strangeness of the nineteenth-century city by forming solid residential groups. These ethnic enclaves, based on language difference and foreign origin, became a fixed aspect of American urban areas. Eventually, the dynamic quality of American life began to dissolve the ethnic communities which had constituted a pattern prevailing for over a century. With the end of large scale foreign immigration and the appearance on the national scene of a remarkable physical and social mobility, the ethnic concentrations lost their importance in the cities. But the stereotypes those concentrations created in the public opinion still remain our ideological tools today.

The "melting pot" ideology, although consecrated by tradition, fails us entirely in trying to approach realistically present-day urban experience.

The "melting pot" ideology dealt effectively with problems of immigrant relations, but has scarce or no validity on the plane of race relations. The European immigrant communities, more often than not, served for the rest of the city population as barriers against Negro mobility. The relationship between the Negro and the foreign-born in the context of the American city has been historically fraught with special difficulties. These difficulties are evident in Miami as a larger number of Cubans (with smaller numbers of Puerto Ricans and Colombians) continue to arrive in the "Tierra de Libertad" (the Land of Liberty).

Racial distinction among Cubans is mild. Yet the acute in-group feeling of the Cuban tends to induce him to reject the Negro, because he is an outsider and a symbol and a target of a racial discrimination already present in the community. It would be dangerous and unwise for the Cuban to be identified with the Negro. Also, quite differently from New York where Puerto Ricans have preceded the Negro entry in many areas, in Miami the Cubans are Johnny-come-lately and, in the heated competition for jobs and housing, the Cubans' relative degree of success is seen as obtained at the expense of the native-born Negro. This explains the desperation of the Negro when he sees the "melting pot" ideology working for all immigrants except himself. The door to the good life seems, among all immigrants to the city, closed only to him. This feeling of alienation mounts in the persisting failure of the "melting pot" concept to work for the Negro, for whom only the city has functioned not as a place where they can lose their isolation and merge with the rest of society, but rather as the place where their separation and alienation are intensified. In desperation, the Negro does not see any way out other than taking power as a group and moving through self-direction to impose consideration of his needs and interests in communal decision making. This means conflict, because no power order which is entrenched will surrender its favored position without resistance.

The dilemma that faces Presbyterians in Miami is that, for their very belonging to the power order, they are increasingly forced to intervene in community organization. Will they wait until forced to do it at a remedial level when things will have gotten out of hand; or, will they consider intervening now when there is still left some latitude of freedom to guide the community development towards mutually accaptable goals of interdependence? If Presbyterians will want to fully discharge their responsibility as Christians, they will have to look beyond the present pattern of just participating in service agencies, which tend to create and maintain dependence on the part of those who are being served and are, for that reason, essentially self-defeating. We cannot simply do something for the underdogs. As participants in the power order, we must mobilize those who are marginal to this order so that they may achieve community power of their own which may be, more often than not, at variance with ours. Our action, rather than around some vague do-good goals, must be organized around the central frustrations and burning issues of the underdogs, well knowing that social conflict must run its full course until it has fully restructured society. In the steps of the One whose mission was "the more abundant life", we are called to humanize our human condition. The humanization of the city may well be the testing point of our Christian mission.

Pastoral Care and Public Ministry

Each must keep in the background of its specific focus a concern for the church's whole mission.

DON BROWNING
Instructor in Religion and Personality, University of Chicago Divinity School

Reprinted from THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY, Sept. 1966 issue by permission

Few would disagree with the statement that one of the most exciting religious developments in modern times is the new effort on the part of the church to discover its ministry in the arena of public affairs. Harkening to the summons of men like Gibson Winter, Colin Williams and Harvey Cox, the church has moved beyond residential and familial concerns and has embarked on a host of new experiments designed to implement a Christian witness in the market place, the real estate office, the chambers of city and national government. At present the church's involvement in the freedom movement constitutes the center of this emerging ministry.

Certain groups of clergy, however, seem averse to taking direct part in the major ethical struggles which face our society. Prominent among them are the ministers closely associated with the so-called pastoral care movement. I refer to professors of pastoral care psychology, chaplain supervisors connected with clinical pastoral education, and local pastors who have made counseling central to their ministries. Of course there are exceptions: individuals among these groups have responded positively to the call for a public ministry. Yet on the whole the participation of pastoral-care men has been limited. But it must be pointed out that their reluctance is matched if not exceeded by a pervasive skepticism about the usefulness of their possible contributions. To be sure, a few leaders who are deeply committed to nonresidential ministries see pastoral psychology and counseling as more than a slightly irrelevant clerical skill. More, however, see it as an enemy and consider it antithetical to the goals they pursue.

Is this hostile attitude toward pastoral counseling justified? Certainly many of the complaints against this discipline contain an element of truth. Some leading theoreticians of public ministry believe that pastoral psychologists are, as one of them put it, the "last of the pietists." They charge that pastoral counseling tends to produce what Philip Rieff calls "the psychological man"—the man primarily concerned with his own emotional well-being and totally without vital ethical concern. They declare that the one-to-one relation between pastor and client ignores certain dehumanizing secondary social structures and tends to result in adjustment to these structures instead of creating in the client the capacity to change them. In some quarters there is a deep suspicion that the counseling pastor meets people in one-to-one situations in order to satisfy his own intimacy needs; in the process he may actually frustrate growth by keeping clients dependent upon him.

Again, it is contended that pastoral counselors are themselves encapsulated in a middle class professionalism, entangled in the trappings of the culturebound disciplines of psychiatry and clinical psychology; they cannot make contact with the culturally deprived—Negro or white--through a labyrinth of office hours, appointment books and 50-minute conversations. Many view the recently formed American Association of Pastoral Counselors as a further sign of the counseling specialist's retreat into a limited and irrelevant professionalism.

Another contra argument is that the pastoral counselor, by his emphasis on release and emotional stability, is rendered totally naive about the importance of conflict in giving man a sense of dignity and power. Such antagonists point out that the civil rights and community organization movements have thrived on conflict, that in the process of fighting for their rights large numbers of people have been rehabilitated.

Finally, there are those who hold that pastoral psychology's use of the "shepherd" as its main image smacks of a stultifying paternalism which precludes full understanding of the meaning of ministry. Thus pastoral psychology and counseling are working with worn-out models largely irrelevant to an era of rapid social change. The discipline presupposes that you can save society if you can save the nuclear individuals and families which constitute its primary units. But since sociology has demonstrated the estrangement between the nuclear family and the secondary structures of society, the very premise of pastoral psychology has been rendered invalid—so the argument goes.

New Ways to Minister to Individuals

As against pastoral psychology, the champions of a public ministry believe that they have discovered new ways to bring individuals to health. Health, they say, can come when people are stimulated to take responsible action in behalf of themselves and their neighbors. Much of what passes for sickness is really the symptomatology of the mass loss of a sense of identity and self-worth in society's dispossessed. That loss has many sources. In the Negro it may arise out of a feeling of powerlessness consequent upon the discrimination which restricts action possibilities; or from the emasculating efforts of the advancing encroachments of an impenetrable and paternalistic bureaucracy. This absence of a sense of power and dignity is compounded by the subservient role which the white community forces upon the Negro and the resultant inability of many Negroes to identify with their own people as a reference group.

In view of these convictions, the prophets of public ministry are inclined to see pastoral care in terms of community organization. To bring health to the dispossessed is to organize them into neighborhood and community structures through which they can gain some control over their own destiny. The primary aim of such organizations is to effect social change. A major side-effect of social change, however, is a new self-image for those who discover that they can alter the forces which operate upon their lives. The philosophy of community organization envisions something more than equal opportunity for those who live in a depressed or rapidly changing environment: it leads to an attempt to develop human potential as a worthy goal in itself. It is hard to say what the energizers of community organization are more interested in: development of leaders in the fight for justice, or the fight for justice as a channel through which human potential can be awakened. The two goals are of course interdependent. The point is that the drive toward public ministry and ethical action through community organization is for many their way of expressing pastoral-care concerns. As such, it is not only good social action; it can also be good pastoral care.

One reason for the suspicion between specialists in these two branches of the practical ministry seems to center on the question of the proper use of conflict. Community organization, the civil rights movement and other forms of public ministry inevitably result in conflict. Whether this conflict is deliberately exploited as an organizational device, a la Saul Alinsky, is immaterial. Community organizers know that in order to gain their proper place in society the dispossessed must learn how to oppose those who, wittingly or unwittingly, are limiting their existence. Hence demonstrations, dissent, obstruction, complaints and counterproposals—which means that conflict sometimes has to be increased instead of decreased. But pastoral psychology (as well as psychiatry and psychology) is (or is thought to be) primarily dedicated to the reduction of conflict, internal as well as external. Therefore it seems irrelevant, if not actually dangerous, to the central strategy of those most deeply involved in public ministry.

Conflict and Pastoral Psychology

That pastoral psychology as a discipline with a discernible body of theory and practice has no stomach for conflict is partly true but mostly false. It is false in that all counseling, secular or pastoral, involves conflict—a threat to existing levels of organization and consequent attempts at resistance and evasion. It is true in that some counseling--generally very bad counseling--ultimately leads to an internal rearrangement of psychic components without much or any alteration in the external situation.

But counseling as a process leading to the internal rearrangement of psychic components for the simple enhancement of individual comfort finds few advocates among contemporary counseling theorists. Rather, counseling is now understood primarily as a process of implementing a relationship that will free the client from a whole range of absolutized values upon which he feels his worth and justification as a person depend. Understood in these terms, counseling sets in motion a conflict with overdetermined value constructs which sharply limit a person's capacity to deal with reality. Increasing the person's capacity for autonomy and agency must go hand in hand with liberating him from the "conditions" of worth which circumscribe his range of free and constructive action.

This view of pastoral counseling is consonant with the biblical view of Jesus' ministry as a battle or conflict with the principalities and powers. Pastoral counseling is often misunderstood because its "shepherd" metaphor has not been related systematically to the Son of Man and Suffering Servant images which undergird the biblical doctrine of ministry. If Gustav Aulen and Hans-Ruedi Weber are correct, the New Testament's dominant image of the ministry is an exorcistic one—battle against the forces of evil being its central motif. With this motif pastoral counseling has never come to terms, though it is quite consistent with the dynamics of much counseling work. On the other hand, Harvey Cox, a major proponent of public ministry, makes exorcistic images focal to this theory of the ministry (in The Secular City, expecially chapter seven, "The Church as Cultural Exorcist," and part three, "Excursion in Urban Exorcism"; see also his God's Revolution and Man's Responsibility, pages 15-36). Pastoral counseling and public ministry will find a point of contact when both take their stance within a truly New Testament concept of the ministry as battle and conflict with the forces which rob man of his sense of autonomy.

Pastoral Care and Public Ministries

The Negro protest movement aims at justice; but it aims also to free Negro and white from the false values which imprison them both. So the community organization movement is not only a method for bringing social change; it is also—if it is in any sense Christian—an effort to liberate oppressor and oppressed from the false absolutes which inhibit both from acting for the good of all. As a form of public ministry community organization has gone full circle and is now moving back into the residential and neighborhood context, attempting to liberate human energies and develop human potential. Deep in the heart of the drive for a public ministry is a concern for individual dignity and worth which, to be effective, must be carried to the back door and into the kitchen of the dispossessed. Such a ministry must ultimately get involved with the individual.

On its part, pastoral counseling must awaken to the potential of public ministry for expressing its own concern for individual human potential. In the midst of a protest demonstration—at the center of the ghetto's fight for better housing, better education, better employment, cleaner streets, more representation—there are great opportunities to free men and women, oppressed and oppressor, for humanizing action and responsibility. The avant garde of our public ministry need not fear that, by admitting a systematic and professionally informed concern for individuals, they will be watering down the fight to demolish the structures of oppression. And the specialists of the counseling ministry need not fear that, by involving themselves in the fight against society's injustice, they will lose their concern for individuals. Pastoral psychology as a discipline may have to get rid of some of its preoccupation with the 50-minute hour, the appointment book and the structured interview—necessary as these are in their right place. It may have to begin theorizing about the dynamics of community action, the effects of different kinds of conflict on human growth, the psychological efficacy of a sense of community power, the consequence of the ideology of the freedom movement for the self-image of the Negro, the mental health increments which may result for the oppressed when they learn more about the workings of the bureaucratic forces which influence their lives. These are legitimate concerns for pastoral psychology. If it turns its knowledge of individuals and groups to them it can make an immense contribution to the church's public ministry.

At the same time, the practitioners of public ministry must be ready to admit that a ministry to individuals does exist, even in the arena of public witness. In the years to come ministry will become more and more specialized —rightly so. But specialization will be fragmentation unless each ministry can keep in the background of its specific focus a concern for the whole gospel, the whole mission of the church. That is, for the one group, a concern that sees individuals against the background of the social structure; for the other, a concern that sees the social structure against the background of the struggle of the individual.

BOOK REVIEW

TENSION: Security or Mission? An Empirical Study
By: Donald W. Zimmerman and Arleon L. Kelley, Ecumenical Center of Renewal & Planning, Merom. $1.00, 1966.

The major thesis of this study is that the problems being faced by the church in Spencer County, Indiana are not the wanton serving of old values or institutional structures, but are in reality from an ideal normative expectation viewpoint a misunderstanding of the nature of the church. The authors have attempted to scientifically evaluate the beliefs, attitudes, and kinds of persons who are involved in the church of that Ohio River County.

After establishing theoretical sociological foundations, Kelley and Zimmerman set out to show that prosperous farmer Jones approaches his economic and educational problems rationally, but social problems and the church in a very parochial and emotional manner.

With references to the literature of rural-urban differentials and social stratification, it is hypothesized that because of the parochialism of churchmen in Spencer County there is little relationship between the concept of the church held there and that which is current in the mainstream of the denominations.

The authors see two alternatives for strategy. In face of local resistance, change could be directed by administrative decision to bring about mergers, federations, etc., and to provide more adequate clerical leadership. This will mean a loss of some individuals unwilling to change, while the other alternative of maintaining the status quo will mean the loss of the youth and young adults. As with many such studies, the reader appreciates having the problems so succinctly defined, but longingly hopes for guidance in the techniques and processes of change, conflict resolution, and development.

Cody Demands That Realto Help Wipe Out 'Blight'

Special to The New York Times

CHICAGO, July 10 — Roman Catholic Archbishop John Cody gave sweeping support today to the newly formed Freedom Movement. He demanded that real estate boards "support open occupancy laws" and work with all "constructive forces of our community to eliminate once and for all the blight and disgrace of our slums."

His message to the civil rights rally at Soldier Field was read by Aloysius J. Wycislo, Auxiliary Bishop of Chicago. Archbishop Cody is visiting church missions in Panama.

It was the strongest support the church has yet given the civil rights movement in Chicago. The Archdiocese includes more than 2.3 million people.

Archbishop Cody said:

"I would address myself to the entire community and especially to the members of my own church to make it very clear that the sale or rental of a home is not merely a financial transaction. It is a moral decision as well. There can be no justification for rejecting a prospective buyer or renter because of his race or religion."

The Archbishop reported that the Chicago Archdiocese had set up fair employment clauses in every contract between parishes and other institutions and builders and contractors.

He reported a "trifaith" conference with Jews and Protestants in seven "distressed districts" of the city.

He also announced approval of several plans for housing developments under Catholic church sponsorship to provide nondiscriminatory and "superior" housing for low- and middle-income families. This housing would be built with 100 per cent federally guaranteed mortgages.

"I salute and encourage fair housing committees and human relation councils in the outlying and suburban areas of our community for their efforts to bring this message to our people," Archbishop Cody declared. "I pledge that the Archdiocese of Chicago will support high-quality integrated education in both public and parochial schools."

He also urged trade unions, in what he called a special plea, to open their membership and apprentice rolls to all qualified applicants regardless of color or creed. He said that he would "exhort" the business community to push forward merit-employment projects to increase job-training programs for minority groups.

Earlier today a letter from the Archbishop backing the civil rights rally was read in all Catholic pulpits in Chicago. In the letter he said that Catholics must join the "social revolution [that] is taking place in America."

The Catholic Interracial Council is one of the organizations that makes up the Coordinating Council of Community Organizations, the local federated civil rights movement.

Archbishop Cody wrote that "millions of our fellow citizens seek freedom, equality and respect."

"They call upon us to join them in their legitimate aspirations," he declared, "and join them we will lest injustice be allowed to continue and the very fabric of our society be rent apart."

Archbishop Cody also said that discrimination because of color, "accent" or country of origin would be an "affront to the one Creator."

The reference to "accent" was interpreted as being related to riots in a Puerto Rican district here last month that pointed up the language barrier between Puerto Ricans and the rest of the community, especially with policemen who sometimes call them "spiks" or "porkchop."

Colorado Police Seek Clues On Campus in Coed Murder

BOULDER, Colo., July 10 (UPI)—The police questioned students and faculty today in the rape and murder yesterday of a college choir girl in a tower of a campus building.

The partly clothed body of Elaura Jeanne Jaquette, 20 years old, was found beneath an organ in the University of Colorado's Mackey Auditorium.

"She must have put up a hell of a fight," District Attorney Rex Scott said of the 5-foot-9-inch senior, a zoology major. He said the killer "must have some marks on him.

"But there are no suspects, and that's straight," Mr. Scott said.

AREA CHURCH

Rev. Clark N. McKinney

Ennis, Montana

1. Introduction

I am writing this discussion of the Area Church at the request of several people of several denominations. Because of this, some introduction is necessary. I am the pastor of an area church in Montana. The Madison Valley Community Presbyterian Church was organized in 1955 by the former Presbytery of Helena, Synod of the Rockies, United Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A. This area Church followed the organization of the Church of the Big Hole in the same Presbytery. The Church of the Big Hole, an area church, follows the course of the Big Hole River in South-western Montana for about 35 miles. This organization served as the pilot project for the Madison Valley Community Presbyterian Church. The Madison Valley Community Presbyterian Church follows the course of the Madison River near Ennis, McAllister and Norris then follows the main highway, U.S. 287 North, into the watershed of the Jefferson River to Harrison and Pony. It is 34 miles from Pony to Ennis the most distant towns in the parish, but we have people related to the church living as far as 35 miles South of Ennis and 15 miles North of Pony. This makes the effective range of the church something over 80 miles. Both churches are now in the Presbytery of Yellowstone.

One of the major reasons for the scope of the involvement with people so widely scattered is the sparseness of the population and the fact that I serve an area Church within an area ministry. Let me explain. My responsilibilities as a Mobile Minister working for our Board of National Missions charges me with an area loosely defined as the watershed of the Madison. In my work I cover a one-hundred and thirty mile route from highway U.S. 10 on the North to 25 miles south of West Yellowstone on the South. I also serve as pastor of the Community Protestant (Presbyterian) Church of West Yellowstone. As I fulfill my responsibility to Mobile Ministries, it is only natural to relate people to the nearest organized church where this is possible. This in part explains the wide area that both of these churches cover. There are also the before mentioned population factors.

The normal flow of trade is from the South or upper end of the Madison Valley, north to Ennis, and then on to Bozeman or Butte. Ennis is the only place where any shopping can be done until you reach West Yellowstone which is 75 miles South or Bozeman which is 55 miles North-east. The enclosed map will make all of this more meaningful.

I can see how this concept of an area church could be very serviceable in an area that is more densely populated and thus covering much less geographical area. The people involved in a more normally rural situation would be more closely related, there would be more leadership potential, the administration would not be so scattered, and more common equipment could be used. There would be more common ground on economics and trade areas.

II. Structure

The total responsibility for the administration, the program and the ministry of the church should be under one Session or governing Body. This governing body should be large enough to allow representation from each population center being united in the area church. The governing body should be also large enough to allow a system of rotation to be established that would provide for representation from various points within the Church. With all points represented you have decisions in the best interest of the whole church. The reasons for this are obvious. In the Presbyterian scheme of things the congregation elects elders and these elders, with the pastor as moderator, constitute the Session. The Session is charged with the responsibility of administration, program and ministry. Trustees can be charged with the care and maintenance of local church property or this can be done by the members of the Session or governing body that represent that local area.

One of the most important things for the governing body to do is to accept the responsibility of governing the church. In this Area Church concept this idea goes beyond our normal thought patterns concerning the local church. In other words it calls for absolute Christian concern in order for the church to perform her best ministry. We need to remember that in an area church we have but one congregation composed of a group of people who are banded together over a large area to perform a ministry of Jesus Christ in a far more productive way than they could have expected to do as small separate congregations.

III. Advantages of the Area Church

One of the clear advantages is that you have everything under a central administration. There may be several church schools with each one adapted to the local need, but each one has the support both financially and spiritually of the whole church. Teachers will have the opportunity to share in training programs that go across the face of the church thus providing for broader experiences and better training. If there are individuals with a particular talent, these persons can be of greater service then they could be if confined to one small congregation. Likewise audio visual equipment and some of the other physical needs of the congregation can be shared over the total church where as they would be unavailable to anyone small unit. This is of course true also for all matter of teaching aids, materials for church interpretation and items for public service. The local situation in most cases can be better served both in terms of programs and equipment. Perhaps the greatest advantage of the area church is the opportunity, through adequate training, to involve a high percentage of laymen in the ministry of the church. The concept of the area church will only work when laymen assume their responsibility for ministry.

IV. The Disadvantages of an Area Church

Perhaps the chief disadvantage of the area church is the fact that the pastor must cover a larger geographical area than what is usually considered normal. As weather and health are serious factors this can hinder the ministry. If the distances are too great or if the program develops to the point of placing severe limitations upon the pastor's time, this too can be a very damaging situation. Another severe disadvantage is having several worship services on a given Sunday and finding times that are acceptable to all concerned including the pastor. I have always believed that the church must have absolute confidence in its laymen, however; in the government of an area church responsible action is demanded in a very high degree. If you do not have it the church will founder and struggle, perform little or no ministry and eventually fail. Another disadvantage is that in some cases the smaller units of the church may feel a lack of identity with the total church. This disadvantage, like the others, may be avoided and overcome.

Perhaps the most controllable disadvantage is in the area of geographical limitations. When such a parish is organized serious consideration must be given to the geographical boundaries. You can only drive so far in a given amount of time, people are only willing to be away from home for what they term a reasonable length of time and if the geographical boundaries are too large the church can choke to death on its own mileage.

V. Criteria for Organization

In terms of organization I would suggest three major areas. In the first place I would say there should be no major separations within the area to be served by the church. I would break these areas of separation into geographical and economic. In terms of geographical separation, mountain passes that must be crossed in the winter, unbridged rivers or lakes, or vast areas of undeveloped terrain that would form a natural barrier separating areas of the church are to be considered. These geographical separations can greatly limit the effectiveness of the pastor by requiring too much time to be spent in travel and increasing the difficulty of bringing the church together for common worship. In terms of economic separation the disunity that occurs among people who go into different trade areas creates problems in conveying the sense of unity that is so helpful in the development of the Area Church. Usually where you have different trade areas represented you also have the children of the people involved going to different schools and generally related to a whole different set of activities. These areas of separation are not critical in the organization of the Area Church, but they are factors that should be considered especially the geographical separations.

Churches or communities to be united in an area church should have certain common factors. I would suggest where possible they be about equal in terms of size and wealth. I believe that communities to be united in an area church should if at all possible have mutal economic interests.

For example, here in the Madison Valley one of our difficulties is a geographic separation in the form of a high pass that divides the parish north and south. Because of this separation the trade areas of the people in the north and south portions of the parish are different. Also related to the geographical separation is the economic separation where by those in the South half of the parish are mostly related to large cattle ranching and the tourist industry. Those in the North half of the parish are generally related to cattle ranching on a small scale and general farming.

This brings me to the third criteria for organization and perhaps the most important. The area church demands a flexibility in terms of meeting and unifying the diverse interest and needs of the people in the area which it is to serve. This flexibility must recognize that even though an area church is formed the initial boundaries can and should be changed to meet shifts in population, industry, or recreational development. This means the area can get larger or smaller depending upon the demands of the situation. Another area of flexibility that must be considered is more in terms of the developing program. One part of a church may grow and prosper while another area may wither and die. The church must be ready and willing to face a very changing situation because the area church by its very nature will never be static.

VI. Program

The regular worship of the church should probably be carried out in as many points as is possible. This is to be determined by attendance and practical factors of distance and the age and health of the worshipers. I would suggest at least one common worship service for the whole church a year.

A church school program should be carried out in as many points as the governing body deems necessary. At each church school there should be a real effort made to remain flexible enough to adopt it to that local situation, to grade it to the levels of the children, and to keep it under supervision of the governing body. These are not isolated church schools but rather a part of the total program of the church. The needs of each part of the area should be considered and efforts made to meet their particular situation.

It may be that a young couples club is needed at one point, women's study group at another, a youth program at another and it may be that they are all needed at one or more points in the parish. Again the key word here is flexibility moving to begin where the people are and meeting their needs. This is a very broad statement on the program because no specific statement can justifiably be made, the guiding line is that the program is the program of one church meeting the needs of one people even though they are scattered over a large area.

VII. The Ministry of the Church

The pastor of an area church cannot do everything or be every place that the pastor of a typical church can. In other words, the real work of the church is done by the laymen. The pastor must be freed from the trivial, clerical, administrative tasks that are usually his, so that he can perform a Pastoral Ministry. Because of the distance that is usually involved in an area church the pastor's regular visitation and his concern for the people is what establishes some of the unity in the congregation. The governing body of the church must really and truly assume the responsibility of policy and program.

The pastor, because of the far flung nature of the church, will have to have some form of under shepherd plan. The laymen in the separate points that are served by the church must be charged with the specific responsibility of notifying the pastor in time of need. Another responsibility these people might carry is the making of appointments for the pastor as he calls in the particular portion of the church. Members of the governing body from one particular point in the church could very well fulfill these functions. An area church must be ready to explore new ways of doing the ministry of Jesus Christ. The church must go beyond its own doorstep in terms of being an evangelistic, concerned, body of believers. I am not speaking of the old concept of evangelism, but rather of the new, where man seeks new and better ways to express the love of God and to bring others into its fellowship.

The concept of the ministry of the area church is fundamentally a ministry of Christian concern to people to whom the church has no meaning or the meaning of the church is badly distorted. This becomes many times an unorthodox ministry. The church tries to reach those within its area who have been unable to understand the previous expression of the Gospel by the Church.

Conclusion:

The Madison Valley Area Church works quite well in spite of having several real disadvantages. Basically, the reason it works and the reason that any area church will work is that this structure allows the church to be the church. The minister cannot do all the things that must be done. If he is to do his job the laymen must also assume great responsibility for the machinery of the church.

The minister becomes in the true sense the pastor. He is the teaching elder or the teacher of teachers for those who do the actual work in Christian Education. He is the administrator in guiding the governing body of the Church in making decisions regarding program and policy. Because he is the pastor and because he is the teaching elder he can know the needs of the people and he can help the church move to meet those needs. In the area church if the pastor should disappear for six months, he certainly would be missed, but the program and ministry of the church should continue undisturbed because the people of God are doing his ministry in their time and their place.

Dear Friend:

The enclosed news release, containing the comments of Reverend James McRee, Dr. Kenneth Neigh and Mrs. Marshall Field, is being provided for your information. As you may know, the Office of Economic Opportunity signed a contract amounting to $8 million for a year-round Head Start program with the Child Development Group of Mississippi (CDGM).

Many of you have worked hard to get this outstanding preschool program refunded in the face of the opposition of segregationists who are against not only CDGM but all anti-poverty and civil rights legislative programs.

The Citizens' Crusade deeply appreciates the support of those who rallied to save what is perhaps the Nation's prime example of a self-help program.

Enclosed also is information about a growing crisis in Texas involving poor migrant laborers.

Kind regards.

Sincerely,

Dick Boone

The eyes of the Nation are beginning to sharply focus on Rio Grande, Texas where an effort to improve the conditions of life for migrant farm laborers has been under way. As in the case of Cesar Chavez and the Delano grape strikers, the brave Texas poor are running into bitter opposition.

Last week six persons were arrested for allegedly disturbing the peace and placed in the Rio Grande jail. Included in these arrested are Reverend James Drake, Administrative Assistant to Cesar Chavez and Gil Padilla, the father of seven children. Rev. Drake was arrested on the Rio Grande courthouse steps as he was saying the Lord's Prayer. Reports indicate that Chief Deputy Sheriff Raul Pena may become as notorious as ex-Sheriff Jim Clark of Selma, Alabama. The situation in Texas is becoming very critical. Your help is needed!

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

CHURCH GROUPS, CDGM, CCAP HAIL SIGNING OF OEO GRANT

WASHINGTON, D.C., JANUARY 30, 1967 -- The following remarks were made at a press conference here after the signing at the Office of Economic Opportunity of a one-year grant of $5 million out of this fiscal year funds, and at least $3 million more out of next fiscal year funds, to the Child Development Group of Mississippi (CDGM). The grant is for the continuation of the Head Start program being carried on by CDGM in fourteen counties in Mississippi.

Highlights of Statement by Reverend James McRee, Chairman of the Board, Child Development Group of Mississippi :

> We know CDGM has never been a perfect program. We have made honest mistakes. Through money received from OEO, it has given hope to thousands of poor children in hundreds of communities in Mississippi. Children now have an opportunity of getting a head start in life. We feel this is the goal of all Americans to offer hope to the impoverished throughout the nation. The staff in the communities that compose the CDGM are dedicated in helping themselves and people within the community to realize their full potential.

Our purpose is to make this program as close to perfect as we possibly can. We are asking for support of the Negro and white community of Mississippi. We need them. We are still trying to get support from local, state and county governments of Mississippi. This program is for the people. We hope all the Congressmen and Senators will support the anti-poverty program in this effort -- to help impoverished people help themselves.

Highlights of Statement by Dr. Kenneth G. Neigh, General Secretary, Board of National Missions, United Presbyterian Church in the USA :

We applaud the grant which has been signed today by Mr. Shriver and Mr. Mudd for CDGM. It has been the result of some very serious and earnest negotiations for some days. It is important to explain why the Mission organization and the National Council of Churches and others should be interested and involved. We believe that CDGM is a clear cut and dramatic example of how the poor themselves can work out new and different kinds of patterns of living and a new image for themselves. We feel that when you have stood by the poor in their need they will hear the evangelical message. Dr. Arthur Fleming, President, National Council of Churches of Christ in the U.S.A. and Dr. Truman Douglass, Chairman, Division of Christian Life and Missions, National Council of Churches, felt in terms of their commitment that the Child Development Group of Mississippi should be supported.

CDGM was not without its problems. There has been a great deal of commitment on the part of many within OEO, just as there has been a deep commitment from the people who have been interested in CDGM. We should express confidence in Mr. Shriver. We look upon him as a dedicated public servant and intend to support him in future Head Start programs with the same kind of strength we mustered for CDGM.

The church discovered poverty long before the U.S. Government did. This is an old battle for us. We believe that the efforts of the Administration to deal with this realistically not only deserves, but requires, the support of the church.

Statement by Mrs. Marshall Field, Chairman of the Board of the Field Foundation:

As Chairman of the Board of the Field Foundation, I came here to offer the congratulations of that Foundation to Mr. Shriver and the Office of Economic Opportunity, to Mr. Mudd and the Child Development Group of Mississippi, to the Presbyterian Board of Missions, and to all others who have assisted in bringing about the negotiations leading to the signing of the agreement by OEO to refund CDGM.

The Field Foundation has been deeply concerned and involved in the problems of CDGM because, since its establishment, the Field Foundation has been committed to the improvement of race relations and child care. We have observed that the best and most enduring results in both fields come from the support of self-initiative at the local level. The CDGM operation, judged on theory and practice, is, in our opinion, one of the most successful projects we have been privileged to support. It is an operation which represents precisely the type of program which the President has called for, and principles for which the President and Vice President have stood for two decades.

We believe that it is conceivable that the War on Poverty can be won by a partnership of the poor with government, and we are certain that today's wise decision signifies a major advance for the forces of reason and progress, and will lead to a major victory in the War on Poverty.

Mr. John Mudd, Executive Director Director of CDGM, stated that there will be no duplication with Mississippi Action for Progress and hopes that a workable relationship will develop. He also stated that CDGM expects to open centers within four weeks.

Jobs and Careers

News of developments in the new careers field

Volume 1, Number 1

WASHINGTON REPORT

President Johnson's Concentrated Employment Program (formerly known as the Urban Slum Employment Program and Jobs in the Ghetto), marks a growing push to commit available anti-poverty funds in programs that provide jobs and income for poor persons. The Concentrated Employment Program is an amalgam of existing manpower programs of the Office of Economic Opportunity and the Department of Labor. It will pool some $100 million in funds and concentrate in approximately 18 cities with high levels of unemployment and high riot potential. About 60,000 jobs are expected to be created in a variety of projects to be funded by the Labor Department which has been given the job of administering the CEP program.

The four programs which make up CEP - the Neighborhood Youth Corps, the Kennedy-Javits Program, the Scheuer Subprofessional Career Act, and the Manpower, Development and Training Act, were designed by Congress to address the problems of job creation and work training. Under CEP they will have an important political task as well: to keep the ghettos cool and thereby avoid the riots that caused last year's backlash vote.

Because of the haste with which CEP programs are being prepared, however, they are in danger of laying an egg in many cities: reports from the field indicate that most of the programs being prepared consist largely of low-level jobs which have traditionally been held by minority group members anyway. Career opportunities and training for meaningful jobs are not being built into the programs.

In one city, for example, a plan has been suggested which can only be called downward mobility; trainees would receive a pay cut of 25¢ per hour at the time of their employment.

The Office of Economic Opportunity is currently developing a proposal for a "Federal Training Insurance Program." The basic objective of the several "TIP" plans being considered is to make job training of poor people more attractive to private employers by reducing their financial "risks." The primary plan would reimburse employers a portion of the wages and training costs of each employer-trained poor person who quits his job within two years. For employees who leave their jobs before three months, employers would be reimbursed up to $250 training costs and the total wages paid to the employee. The reimbursement would decrease on a sliding scale until the end of the two year period. The proposal also suggests possible positive payments to employers for a six month post-training period, if the insurance program is not a sufficient inducement for employers to keep the newly trained workers on the jobs.

Such a program would be fine for employers, but 1) would not guarantee all trainees jobs; 2) could drive wages down to the lowest level; 3) would encourage employers to keep these employees in low-paying training slots as long as possible because the proposed insurance would cover "informal on-the-job-training."

To subsidize training at higher skill levels the OEO proposal suggests an "incentive program." This plan would allow employers, upon a signed agreement with an employee, to withhold a portion of the worker's wages for a two and a half year period. Under this kind of industrial serfdom the employee must stay with the firm until the end of the two and a half years to collect this part of his wages which have, in the meantime, been tax-free investable funds for the employer.

ON THE LEGISLATIVE FRONT:

Senator Joseph Tydings (D-Maryland) has introduced a bill (S.1361) called the "Employment Opportunity Act of 1967." Its purpose is to have the Civil Service Commission "to the maximum degree practicable: conduct program of recruitment and develop training program for unskilled or low-skilled workers to meet employment shortages in the Federal Government. Tydings' bill carries the important provision that any individual who successfully completes the training program would be automatically eligible for Federal employment in the classifications for which he was trained.

Congressman James Scheuer (D-New York), author last year of the Subprofessional Career Amendment to the Economic Opportunity Act, has introduced two new amendments to the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965. The amendments have been accepted by the House Committee on Education and Labor. One would require local educational agencies which receive grants involving the use of education aides to set forth "well-developed plans providing for coordinated programs of training in which education aides and the professional staff whom they are assisting will participate together." The second amendment provides for grants to state education agencies for "programs and other activities specifically designed to encourage the full and adequate utilization and acceptance of auxiliary personnel (such as teacher aides) in elementary and secondary schools on a permanent basis."

The proposed 1967 amendments to the Economic Opportunity Act will merge the Scheuer subprofessional Career Amendment to provide career public service employment for the adult poor and the "Nelson" (after Sen. Gaylord Nelson, D-Wisconsin) Amendment of 1965. The merger came about after the House Labor and Education Committee concluded that the Nelson Amendment was "too limited in the scope of its activities and the size of the program it envisions to reduce substantially the many who are hard core unemployed." Instead, the House recommended a combined program to secure entry level positions for unemployed and underemployed persons in the public service sector of the economy with built-in opportunities for training and experience.

NEW IDEAS

"Institutes of Medical Technology" have been suggested by Brendan Sexton as (possible) permanent training facilities for new careerists who would work in hospital-connected, out-patient treatment centers scattered throughout urban poverty communities. From the outset, a complete new careers programs would be operated at each of the centers and at the hospital. Even before becoming degree-granting institutions, such Institutes would attract to poverty communities large numbers of middle class professionals, such as physicians, nurses, technicians, professors, and others. Mr. Sexton proposes to induce these people to live in the poverty area by offering housing allotments of 10 to 15% of salary, applicable only in cooperatives of condominiums built by the employing institution. Mr. Sexton, Director of Training for CCAP, says the same allotment could be used to encourage advancing new careerists in their communities.

One of the paradoxes found in the health programs of the developing areas of the world is that "the smaller the difference in educational level between health auxiliary workers and the general population, the more effective those workers will be." This statement is from an article titled "Three Paradoxes in Health Development" by Donald T. Rice, M.D. MPH, which appeared in the October, 1966, issue of Public Health Reports, published by the U.S. Public Health Service.

Dr. Rice says that in the United States the "really exciting advances in the training and use of auxiliaries have been in the health programs among some minority groups." He cites work in health services for Indian and Spanish-speaking people, and programs aimed at lower economic groups and seasonal agricultural workers. "Perhaps their (auxiliary, or subprofessional, health workers) greatest value is that they have greatly facilitated communication," writes Dr. Rice.

In developing countries, Dr. Rice says "it has been repeatedly demonstrated that leaders with native intelligence but with minimum educational qualifications can be trained to be effective health workers, either curative or preventive." He cites work done in Java, Peru and Ghana and quotes a report from the latter which concludes: "There is little doubt that the well trained and experienced auxiliary can show standards of skill which are comparable with that of the average medical man in performing his particular work, whether it be in examining slides for trypanosomes, in giving injections or in the performance of lumbar puncture."

News from the Field

The Labor Department has granted a $2.1 million contract for the training of 6,000 sub-professional health workers over an 18 month period. The training will be done in hospitals and other health institutions in 13 states. The contract to administer this "Health Services Training Project" was made with the Social Development Corporation, a non-profit social planning agency, with funds from the Manpower Development and Training Act.

The Project is designed to upgrade, on a career ladder basis, employees at all kinds of health institutions through on-the-job training programs. Institutions may also include new employees in the training, but they must be hired by, and actually working at, the institution. Training for virtually all occupations found in health facilities will be included with the exception of occupations requiring a state license.

In San Francisco, the Planning Committee for New Careers has found considerable interest in private agencies to prepare poor persons for "second level" jobs in the human service field. Because of the training investment involved, agencies do not want to take trainees at the entry level. The Committee has participated in the planning of San Francisco's federally supported Concentrated Employment Program (CEP) and has come up with a plan that calls for the restructuring of the city's civil service system, to include several thousand new career positions. Mayor John F. Shelley is honorary chairman of the committee, and is backing the move to open up new career positions in city jobs, as is the Civil Service Commission which has a full-time staff member assigned to developing such new career opportunities.

The Citizens Crusade Against Poverty will devote a major effort to developing new careers opportunities in education, economic development, housing and physical rehabilitation. The Crusade will specifically work to build support for new careers programs in these fields among labor unions, grass roots organizations, churches and civil rights groups. In addition, the Crusade will keep track of legislative developments on the hill, report on them in a regular newsletter.

DuBose Conference Center
Monteagle, Tennessee
October 13-16, 1966

- Sponsored by the Episcopal Dioceses of Alabama and Tennessee -

The Purpose of a Communication Conference is to make it possible for those participating to communicate themselves in new and more satisfying ways with other people. It is not primarily to learn something about communication. Its objective is behavioral, aimed at helping participants convert their intentions into action.

Specifically, each person attending may expect to have an opportunity:

- to increase his knowledge of how he communicates to others (How do others see you as you communicate? What do you lead others to think you want as a response to what you say?)
- to increase his knowledge of how others communicate themselves to him (Do others see you as being open to communication or closed? How do others shape their communications to you? What kinds of communication are you likely not to get from others?)
- to increase his understanding of how a group influences what is communicated among its members (What patterns do groups set as to what is permissable and what is unacceptable? How can these patterns be examined? How can they be changed?)
- to experiment with new ways of communicating with others in order to develop community among the members of a group.

How Does It Work? A Communication Conference differs from many other kinds of learning situations in that the individual participant is responsible for setting his own learning goals. Participants work primarily in groups, varying in size from two to twenty, in which the primary emphasis is placed on learning from what is being experienced in the group "here and now." The intent is for each person to learn how to examine his own behavior as he engages in communication with other people and to experiment with new forms of behavior. There are consequently few lectures, as this is not a "subject-centered" conference in the usual sense.

It pays off! A growing number of men and women have found a new freedom and openness in their relationship with other people as a result of this kind of learning experience. It has begun to make a marked difference in their home life, their relationships on the job, and the quality of life in their churches and other organizations of which they are a part.

Time: Beginning with supper at 6:30 p.m. on Thursday, October 13, 1966, and concluding after supper at 6:00 p.m. on Sunday, October 16. Every participant is expected to arrive on time and remain for the entirety of the conference.

Place: DuBose Conference Center is located just off the main highway through Monteagle, Tennessee. All linens and towels are provided, and DuBose serves exceptionally fine meals.

Cost: $25.00 per person, to be sent with registration form in advance.

NOTE: Persons who have previously participated in a Communication Conference or similar learning experience may make application for the ADVANCED SEMINAR ON ORGANIZATIONAL CHANGE to be held at the same time and place as this conference. See separate informational sheet and registration blank.

U.S. REDS TO JOIN CIVIL RIGHTS DRIVE

Convention Here Warned on 'White Chauvinism'

By PETER KIHSS

The Communist party, U.S.A., declared yesterday it intended to move openly into civil rights struggles. The head of its Negro commission asserted "we will allow no one in the civil rights movements or the white power structure" to block this

Claude Lightfoot, identified also as leader of the party in Illinois, contended that time had shown that economic equality for Negroes was "only possible in a socialist reorganization of society." He said the party supported "self-defense for Negroes," but "we are not advocates of violence."

The party's 18th national convention at Webster Hall, 119 East 11th Street, adopted a new Negro program including a call for more determined struggle against "white chauvinism," even within the party.

Mr. Lightfoot said this was a call for "inter-racial living" to make Communists a "model in overcoming arrogant attitudes."

Earlier in the day, the party acknowledged in self-criticism that its appeals to labor and Negroes were weak. In a briefing for newsmen on the closed-door sessions, George Meyers, a Maryland leader, reported that delegates had sent a draft of a labor program to the incoming national committee.

Roscoe Proctor, a 45-year-old Negro from Berkeley, Calif., who said he had been in the party 24 years, observed: "There's a gap in activities that have taken place among the Negro people."

The Communist party, U.S.A., declared yesterday it intended to move openly into civil rights struggles. The head of its Negro commission asserted "we will allow no one in the civil rights movements or the white power structure" to block this

Claude Lightfoot, identified also as leader of the party in Illinois, contended that time had shown that economic equality for Negroes was "only possible in a socialist reorganization of society." He said the party supported "self-defense for Negroes," but "we are not advocates of violence."

The party's 18th national convention at Webster Hall, 119 East 11th Street, adopted a new Negro program including a call for more determined struggle against "white chauvinism," even within the party.

Mr. Lightfoot said this was a call for "inter-racial living" to make Communists a "model in overcoming arrogant attitudes."

Earlier in the day, the party acknowledged in self-criticism that its appeals to labor and Negroes were weak. In a briefing for newsmen on the closed-door sessions, George Meyers, a Maryland leader, reported that delegates had sent a draft of a labor program to the incoming national committee.

Roscoe Proctor, a 45-year-old Negro from Berkeley, Calif., who said he had been in the party 24 years, observed: "There's a gap in activities that have taken place among the Negro people."

The party, he said, enjoys prestige among large numbers of Negroes, but they are not joining up for fear of persecution and loss of jobs.

Non-Communist Observers

Among "discussion material" circulated to delegates was a statement from the "Echo Park Section" in an integrated area of Los Angeles complaining that "physically, in its makeup, our party is a white party."

The statement also asserted that unions and political leaders who had helped civil rights in the South often resisted Negro advances in the West and North.

Mr. Lightfoot, a 56-year-old Chicagoan, described as having spent 35 years in the party, asserted that "the argument that we could win the struggle without Communists had failed." He declared the Communists "will not sit on the sidelines as we sometimes have in the past."

As to Negro strength among the party's claimed 12,000 members, Mr. Lightfoot said it would be "hard to say—1,000, 2,000, merely an educated guess." But then he declared, "Take no solace from measuring membership," and likened the party's return to a public arena to the surge of early Christians.

The lengthy "resolution on the Negro question" called for building a Negro-labor alliance for legislative and electoral battle, for spending $100-billion to "eliminate the ghetto" (which Mr. Lightfoot said would require a halt of spending for "guns") and for unionizing workers, especially in the South.

One of some 200 non-Communist observers allowed in the closed sessions, James H. Forest, national secretary of the Catholic Peace Fellowship, told reporters "about half" the participants appeared to be young.

This did not surprise him, he said, because his experience was that collegians regarded the Communist party as "a moderate, well-established, well-known left-wing organization that had made some contributions to progress" as against more leftist groups that "aligned themselves with violence."

Mr. Forest, 25, is the son of a former Communist district organizer in St. Louis. He said he had never had any interest in joining the party, having been "horrified" by Communist attitudes toward the arts.

He said he had become a Roman Catholic and a pacifist while serving in the Navy, and believed "there may be an absolute contradiction between pure dialectical materialism and Christianity."

Hoover Says Communists To Push Negro Recruiting

WASHINGTON (UPI) —FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover predicts that the U.S. Communist party — "accutely embarrassed by its failure to adequately recruit among Negroes" — will step up its efforts to infiltrate civil rights organizations.

"To their everlasting credit, the vast majority of Negroes have recognized the falsity of communism and turned it down," Hoover said.

Nevertheless, he said, American Communists "will step forward even more boldly, hoping to infiltrate and influence civil rights organizations . . . (as) a hatchery for communism."

The FBI director's views were contained in a 12-page statement on the party's national convention last month in New York, its first since 1959. it was made public Sunday by the Senate internal security subcommittee, which requested Hoover's comments.

The party "undoubtedly is in a much stronger position" as a result of the convention, Hoover said, and "remains a serious threat to our national security."

"The convention actually was a 'coming out party,' signifying a new era in the party's life," he added. "The party will now be more aggressive, seeking allies among non-Communists. It hopes to disarm Americans ideologically."

Hoover attributed the party's new confidence in emerging from years of seclusion to a 1965 Supreme Court decision. The ruling said Communists could invoke the Fifth Amendment guarantee against self-incrimination and refuse to register with the government.

Locher Pins Cleveland Riots on Red Agitators

Mayor Disputes Katzenbach on Cause of Turmoil—Federal Aid Urged

COMMUNISM

By MARJORIE HUNTER

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Aug. 26 — Mayor Ralph S. Locher of Cleveland "wholeheartedly" agreed today with grand jury findings that recent riots in his city had been fomented by trained agitators, assisted by Communists.

He thus disputed the conclusion of Attorney General Nicholas deB. Katzenbach, who had said that poverty and despair, not Communists or black nationalists, were the "true agitators."

The Mayor told a Senate subcommittee conducting hearings into the crisis of the cities:

"I believe the Attorney General is wrong. I believe the grand jury is correct."

A Cuyahoga County (Ohio) grand jury charged on Aug. 8 that Cleveland's racial violence in mid-July was "organized and exploited "by a small group of "trained and disciplined professionals," aided by some "members or officers in the Communist party."

Four persons died and 40 others were injured in the riots in the Hough and Superior areas of Cleveland before the police and members of the Ohio National Guard restored order.

Questioned by Senator Robert F. Kennedy, Democrat of New York, Mr. Lucher told the subcommittee:

"In my judgment, and this is pure speculation, we would not have had the turmoil we had if it had not been for Communist agitators."

Meetings Are Cited

However, the Mayor said that it "would be a tragic mistake for us to think that if we got rid of Communists, all our problems would go away."

Defending his efforts to eradicate the slums of Hough, the Mayor said that for more than two years he had sought to head off an explosion. He told of dozens of meetings held by city officials seeking to improve housing and to find jobs for the unemployed.

Interrupting him, Senator Abraham A. Ribicoff, Democrat of Connecticut, suggested that "endless rounds of meetings" could lead only to frustration for the people of ghettos.

"The people are getting the run-around and nothing happens," the Senator said. "Nothing could be more inflammatory for people with problems."

Mr. Locher insisted, however, that the meetings had led to positive action on housing, urban renewal, job training, recreational facilities and other urban problems.

The Mayor, a Democrat, joined other mayors, who testified earlier this week, in asking for more Federal money and less Federal red tape.

U.S. Held at Fault

The Mayor of Omaha, A. V. Sorensen, who followed Mr. Locher to the witness stand, placed much of the responsibility for city riots, including one in his city this summer, on the Federal Government.

He said one of the seeds of rioting had been the failure of well-publicized Federal promises to match Federal performance.

"It's a question of nit-picking on details that would try the patience of Job," he complained.

Describing himself as "the most frustrated Mayor in all America," Mr. Sorensen, a Republican, said that depite 15 months of trying and the vast resources of the Government, he had been unable to get a single low-income housing unit built in Omaha.

"I've just about made up my mind to try to get private industry to do the job and forget the Federal Government," he declared. "It's a sad fact of life."

"The Negro wants first-class citizenship now and he is tired of a lot of headline promises from Government," Mr. Sorensen added.

The subcommittee hearings, which began two weeks ago, are expected to recess for the remainder of the year after testimony next week from a number of witnesses.

Among those scheduled to testify are Representative Adam Clayton Powell, Democrat of Manhattan, and two Negro writers, Claude Brown, author of "Manchild in the Promised Land," and Ralph Ellison, author of "Invisible Man."

40 Witnesses Heard

When the Cuyahoga County grand jury issued its report holding trained agitators and Communists responsible for the Cleveland riots it cited as evidence the testimony of 40 witnesses taken during seven days of hearings.

The panel, which was headed by Louis B. Seltzer, retired editor of The Cleveland Press, said in its findings:

"It is no casual happenstance or coincidence that those throwing firebombs, or bricks, or bottles, or pillaging or generally engaged in disorder and lawlessness were in the main young people obviously assigned, trained and disciplined in the roles they were to play in the pattern of these dual outbreaks separated by less than one month."

The Hough and Superior areas of Cleveland were hit by waves of rioting and violence on June 23 and 24 and again beginning on July 18.

The jury singled out the W. E. B. DuBois Club, the Communist party and a black nationalist community center called J. F. K. House for their alleged roles in the rioting. The J. F. K. House is named for Jomo (Freedom) Kenyata, president of Kenya.

Negroes Score Findings

The jury's findings immediately provoked criticism from Negro leaders in Cleveland, who said the findings would "camouflage" the real problems of the city's Negro sections. One leader, Bertram E. Gardner, director of the Municipal Community Relations Board, described the jury's accusations as an attempt by the white community to escape responsibility for the plight of the Negroes.

"Actually, the living conditions were the things that caused the riots," he said. "They [the rioters] didn't need any Communists to tell them they're suffering."

Later, two policemen who had infiltrated local units of the Communist party—men whose testimony the jury had cited as the basis for its report—said they had no knowledge that Communists had either inspired the riots or played any direct role in them.

Is There a "Breakdown" of the Negro Family?

■ Recent events have reactivated controversy concerning two questions: (1) Is the low-income American Negro family showing "rapid deterioration" or continuance of long-standing patterns? (2) Are its patterns mainly rooted in the legacy of slavery? This analysis sees a long-standing picture rather than drastic change and relates family pattern primarily to postslavery conditions. ■

MUCH HAS BEEN said of late—and often with great heat—about the Negro family. Despite prevailing consensus on a number of points, controversy has been generated with regard to other points because one man's fact is another man's fiction. Some points of consensus deserve mention before points of controversy. First, it is generally agreed that a harmonious two-parent home is better for children than a one-parent home—and better for parents, too, in this society. It is agreed also that fatherless homes are far more frequent among Negroes than among whites and that in both groups their frequency rises as income falls.

Another point of firm consensus is that strong action is needed to remedy adverse conditions that have existed far too long, especially for low-income Negroes; and that these conditions bear especially on the low-income Negro man, whose disadvantaged situation takes heavy toll of himself, his children, their mother, and the family unit as a whole. All these statements have long been accepted by serious students of Negro family life.[1]

The controversy centers mainly on the following points: (1) whether "the" Negro family is "crumbling" at a disastrous rate, (2) whether the amount of breakdown that exists is primarily due to poverty, or to cultural inheritance, or to a cycle of self-perpetuating pathology, (3) whether the

Young Says Ingredients Remain For Summer Negro 'Explosions'

Whitney M. Young Jr., executive director of the National Urban League, said yesterday there was a strong likelihood of racial riots and "explosions" in Negro ghettos this summer despite antipoverty programs and civil rights laws.

"We are not immune or free of the possibility of riots," the civil rights leader said after an appearance on "Page One" over WABC-TV. "The ingredients that precipitated the riots of the past are still here. There is more impatience, more anger and more willingness to express one's feeling."

During his television interview he was strongly critical of some antipoverty programs, saying they lacked coordination and complaining that they were not sustained throughout the year.

"The Negro," he said, "is getting terribly upset about the fact that along about April or May of every year you see a great flurry of activity to produce something for the summer to keep it cool."

"The Negro of the ghetto today is increasingly of the notion that the powers that be are more interested in peace and order than they are in the promotion of justice and equal opportunity."

Mr. Young said the funds made available to Negro communities by the Federal war on poverty were disappointing" and "in many cases had led to frustrations where expectations were high and tangible results were not seen."

"The Negro no longer can be appealed to on the basis of love and non-violence and being patient," he said.

Earlier yesterday, William H. Booth, chairman of the City Commission of Human Rights, said the commission would soon establish a "clearing house" of housing vacancies for members of minority groups to bring about "true open occupancy in the city of New York."

No Reports from Labor

Interviewed on the radio and television program, "Direct Line," over WNBC, Mr. Booth said the commission had been working on an informal basis with the Urban League and the city Department of Relocation in finding homes and apartments for minority group members.

He said a proposal for the "clearing house" would be made at a meeting of the commission on Wednesday.

Mr. Booth said he had not received reports from two powerful labor groups to show how they had moved toward full integration of their memberships since 1963.

Last Sunday, Mr. Booth had set a deadline for the New York Central Labor Council and the New York Building Trades Council to come forth with such reports within a week. Later, Peter Brennan, president of the building group, said he had no reports to give Mr. Booth.

The commission chairman said yesterday the labor groups' refusal to turn in reports would be taken up at the Wednesday meeting.

"If we don't get this compliance I will certainly ask the full commission to order a public hearing to air the condition with reference to membership [of Negroes] in the craft unions.

AC 5/13/66

By United Press International

A report by two human relations groups Thursday warned that continued "white lawlessness" could bring "retaliatory violence" from Negroes in the South.

"The forebodings current in 1965-66 among those who know the region best in many ways suggest darkness before dawn," said a document released in Atlanta by the Southern Regional Council, Inc., and in Washington by the American Jewish Committee.

The regional council has its avowed aim the attainment of equal opportunity for all peoples in the South. The American Jewish Committee, founded in 1906, is a pioneer group in the fight against bigotry.

VIOLENCE REPORTED

According to the joint report, 10 killings and "uncounted" beatings, burnings, bombings and shootings were recorded in the South during a six-month period following the start of "peaceful" desegregation in the region in September, 1965.

It said Americans have been "deluded" about the facts of southern school integration, and were wrong in the assumption that "federal money and southern honor" would carry the day for peaceful acceptance of classroom desegregation laws.

The report said that between 5 and 6 per cent of the south's 3,014,025 Negro children are now attending classes with whites. And, it contended, the parents have been subjected to violence and economic pressures.

EXPRESS HOPE

It expressed hope that the tightening of federal desegregation guidelines and better law enforcement would step up desegregation of southern schools next fall.

In reviewing accounts of violence on the part of whites in the south, the report said that "a new thread of Negroes' fearlessness and determination" had been found.

The report said the most compelling factor of the continuing crisis "has to do with the mood of answering anger, of retaliatory violence among Negroes of the south, and the threat in the cities, particularly, of rampage and riot, echoing the legacy of white lawlessness so long the south's greatest disgrace."

Travel Act Tabled in Penn Case

By REMER TYSON
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — A section of the 1966 civil rights bill forbidding interference with rights to travel "would not reach" the slaying of Lemuel Penn in Georgia, the U.S. Civil Rights Commission said Thursday.

Attorney General Nicholas de B. Katzenbach had said earlier that another section of the bill would authorize prosecution in cases similar to the Penn slaying. Katzenbach named the Penn case as an example.

The Civil Rights Commission, in a written statement submitted to a House Judiciary subcommittee by staff director William L. Taylor, recommended addition of a provision clearly "making criminal any interference with a person using any road or highway in interestate commerce."

SLAYING RECALLED

Taylor said the section as now written "would not reach, for example, the wanton murder of Lemuel Penn in Georgia last year while he was driving through the state returning from duty with the National Guard."

Taylor said the section "is limited to travel by common carrier."

Katzenbach told the subcommittee Tuesday that killings such as in the Penn Case would be covered under a provision allowing prosecution for random use of force or violence against Negroes to discourage civil rights activities.

"I think that would be similar to Colonel Penn's," Katzenbach told the subcommittee.

ON HOUSING BIAS

Other Civil Rights Commission recommendations to strengthen the 1966 bill include:

1 Withdrawal of federal charters for banks and savings and loan associations which practice discrimination in housing transactions.

2. Give a federal agency the administrative authority to investigate and to make prompt determination in cases involving housing discrimination in order to prevent lagging enforcement.

3. Permit persons damaged by violation of their civil rights to sue for recovery against individuals or governments responsible for losses.

4. Permit individuals to obtain injunctive relief from prosecutions brought against them while exercising First Amendment rights.

THE 'TRAGIC GAP' IN RIGHTS SCORED

N.A.A.C.P. Fund Notes Lag on Schools and Jobs

By ALFRED FRIENDLY JR.

On the 12th anniversary of the Supreme Court's school desegregation decision, only one Southern Negro child in 20 attends an integrated school, a civil rights group reported yesterday.

Twenty months after the passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to assure equal job opportunity, the Negro unemployment rate is "twice that of whites," the annual report of the N.A.A.C.P. Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc., declared.

And in the entire field of civil rights, there is a "tragic gap" between the law and its enforcement, "a gap between the promise and the reality," the fund's director-counsel, Jack Greenberg, said.

"The gap is far too large in every aspect of life that you can think of," he told a news conference in the New York Hilton where the fund will hold a two-day convocation today and tomorrow on the theme of "The Tragic Gap."

Among the scheduled speakers at the conference on civil rights progress and future programs are Bayard Rustin, executive director of the A. Philip Randolf Institute; Secretary of Labor W. Willard Wirtz; Dr. Kenneth B. Clark, the psychologist; the Solicitor General Thurgold Marshall and Senator Robert F. Kennedy.

Annual Report released

A yesterday's news conference, Mr. Greenberg released the fund's annual report, also titled "The Tragic Gap." The 30-page pamphlet cited "tokenism" in Southern school integration; "meager compliance' with efforts to desegregate some Southern hospitals and "blatant segregation" in most; "racial bigotry" in the conduct of Southern justice, and a national Negro rate of unemployment "twice that of whites."

The summer of 1966, Mr. Greenberg said, may expose the bitterness Negroes feel about the slow pace of civil rights enforcement.

"Unless there is rapid progress, we are going to have a damming up of disillusionment, and at some point the dam will break," he said. "If there are vigorous efforts to move ahead and if there's involvement of the Negro community in this effort, it can be a productive summer."

'Painful Disadvantage'

According to the report, "a mere 5.2 per cent of Negro children in the South (are) attending integrated schools," and many of those schools "maintained segregated classrooms, white-only extracullicular activities and separate school buses."

"At every juncture where justice is secured or tempered with mercy," the report said, "the Negro is at a painful disadvantage." Ninety per cent of the 451 persons executed in 17 Southern and Border states and the District of Columbia since 1930 were Negroes, it added.

Noting that the Legal Defense Fund's activities had moved to "wholesale treatment" of civil rights problems, Mr. Greenberg said the fund had filed 900 complaints of job bias before the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission since last July, had helped register 4,000 Negro children in formerly all-white schools in the South and filed 175 complaints abou discrimination in health car services.

In addition, Mr. Greenberg said, part of the 1966 budget of $2-million was being spent on handling some 385 pending legal cases.

'BEST PLACE IN THE WORLD'

U.N. Aide Likes Future of South

By REMER TYSON
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — Dr. James Madison Nabrit Jr., this country's No. 2 man at the United Nations, says the South is "going to be the best place in the world."

Nabrit, 65, voices his opinion from this vantage point: He is one of the world's top leaders who has traveled extensively; he is a Negro who was born and reared in the South.

The deputy to Ambassador Arthur S. Goldberg is a native of Atlanta. He has lived in Americus and Augusta and practiced law in other parts of the South.

Southern racial conditions have hurt the United States a "great deal" in international politics, said Nabrit.

"WESTERN countries for a long time didn't think much of colored people," he explained. "It was in the period when the Western countries were dominating the world."

Independent African and Asian countries do not fear the United States as a colonial power, Nabrit said, but they are apprehensive about whether the United States will assist its friends in that role.

"The question is," said Nabrit, "can these Western countries be for freedom and self-determination? We have faired good in the last 10 years because we are trying to come to grips with the Negro problem.

"My view is, the South, once it gets this thing off its back, is going to be the best place in the world. The ones standing in the way of it now will be the largest benefactors.

"While they have been witch hunting and holding the Negro down, the North has been holding them down. Anybody who did anything had to leave the South. I meet people (from the South) all over the world with great talent."

Nabrit points to President Johnson as an example of what a Southerner can accomplish once he is freed from the political burden of the Negro problem.

"A Southerner, if he makes up his mind to do something, is going to do something," said Nabrit. "Not only that, he has the training." The U.N. delegate again referred to President Johnson as the best evidence.

DR. J. M. NABRIT JR.
On Leave from University

Nabrit is another example of a Southerner who left this na- Morehouse College at Atlanta in tive region in order "to do something."

HE WAS graduated from 1923 and received a law degree from Northwestern University in 1927.

Nabrit entered law practice and found legal work in the South a frustrating chore.

"I would go into court and everybody would say I was right, but the law was not on my side," said Nabrit.

"In 1936 I came to Washington to begin training lawyers to change the law. . . ."

Coming to Washington meant teaching law at Howard University. He is now on leave of absence as president of the institution. That's where his heart still is, and he hopes to return to Howard in September.

In fact, President Johnson and Ambassador Goldberg had a tough time breaking his tie temporarily with the university. Nabrit was on a two-month leave of absence from Howard University and was on the Far East leg of a world tour when Goldberg telephoned him last September.

Goldberg informed Nabrit that the President wanted him to assume the post of deputy representative to the U.N. Security Council with the personal rank of ambassador.

Nabrit turned down the appointment. Goldberg telephoned the next night to say the President was "disturbed" at Nabrit's answer. Nabrit said no again.

GOLDBERG called the next night to report the President insisted that Nabrit take the appointment. Nabrit finally agreed to do so. He had been backed into a corner.

"We have been saying Negroes have not been getting these appointments," explained Nabrit. "Then, when the President called on me, I refused. I felt I would have to take the appointment to back up what I was saying."

President Johnson named Nabrit last April 26 as the representative to speak for this country at the United Nations when Goldberg is busy elsewhere.

Nabrit believes the United Nations has demonstrated unusual strength in the past year. His point is that on the heels of the settling internal strife over financing of the organization, the Pakistan - India conflict popped up.

"While it has not solved the Kashmir problem," said Nabrit, "it has eased the situation. This (handling of the Kashmir issue right after the internal crisis) is an indication of immense strength."

"The world is so constructed and the dnagers of war are so catastrophic, that nations must have a place of discussion," Nabrit said. "Just to let off steam is a great factor in human relations as in industrial relations.

"We need the United Nations to gather numbers to go along with our power. We've got the power. We can go out here and wipe out everybody. . . . This is the problem that faces the American citizen: You have all this power and you have to decide how to use it".

Nabrit, interviewed in his 10-room brick home located on the rolling, carefully landscaped northwest side of Washington, had this advice for a young Southern Negro today.

"I would get all the training his brains and talent would take, at the best schools he could get, and to make as many contacts as he could with people in various aspects of life in the South."

Nabrit doesn't expect the South to get "this thing off its back" immediately. But his advice says the young Southerner will have opportunity to develop his talent within his native region.

Additional Race Related Deaths in the United States

Sept., 1965 - June, 1966

These are cases involving violent death between the races in the South. The list is of course not complete; it is not restricted to cases involving civil rights. It is compiled from newspaper accounts, and in some instances, where cooperation could be obtained, reports from officials.

Alvin Lamar Brown (N) 10/14/65.	Chattanooga, Tennessee. A Negro neighborhood youth corpsman was shot and killed by a white fellow worker. The young Negro was seated on bleachers the corpsmen were building near a high school, when the white youth walked up and opened fire with a .22 caliber pistol.
Willie Joe (last name not given in press accounts) (N) 10/6/65.	Hampton, South Carolina. An elderly Negro junk dealer was shot and killed apparently after an argument over money. The sheriff said the old man had been "a fixture in the town. He made his living by collecting and selling junk from a moveable cart." A white man was charged with the murder.
James Robert Smith (N) 11/9/65.	Nashville, Tennessee. The ten year old Negro was brutally beaten to death. A fifteen year old white youth was being held in the affair.
Joseph Robert McNair (N) 11/8/65.	Pelahatchie, Mississippi. Shot by a white constable who claimed the 30 year old McNair "came at him with an open pocketknife."
Willie B. Tucker (N) 12/12/65.	Liberty, South Carolina. A Brooklyn, New York, Negro was traveling through Liberty with his wife and family en route to Alabama. After a fruitless search for a place to spend the night, the man was taken to the police station, where officers made calls to help find a place. According to press accounts "When he (Tucker) was asked questions . . . he was shot by a policeman after a brief scuffle with officers."
Edward Culbreth (N) 12/7/65.	Hamburg, Arkansas. The fourteen year old Negro youth was shot while standing in front of a cafe on the main street of Portland. Two white brothers were held in the shooting. The county sheriff told reporters that as far as he could determine there was no provocation for the shooting."

Samuel Younge, Jr. (N) 1/6/66.	Tuskegee, Alabama. The victim, a freshman at Tuskegee Institute and field worker for the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, was shot to death . . . following a dispute at a service station.
Vernon Dahmer (N) 1/11/66.	Hattiesburg, Mississippi. A leader in Negro voter registration died of burns when his home and store were fire-bombed. Fourteen Ku Klux Klansmen were charged by the Federal government with violation of the victim's civil rights.

Negro Gangs Hurl Bombs At Chicago Police Cars

AC 7/13/66

CHICAGO (UPI)—Roving gangs rampaged through a near West Side Negro neighborhood Tuesday night, tossing Molotov cocktails at police cars and looting scores of stores. Civil rights leader Martin Luther King rushed to the scene.

The plate glass windows of every store in one large shopping plaza were shattered and the shelves of a food supermart emptied before police arrived.

Several gangs of up to about 250 youths each formed throughout the area after police turned off two fire hydrants being used by children during the hot afternoon.

The gangs broke into stores, broke windows and street lights as they roamed the area. One police squad car was set afire by a flaming Molotov cocktail and police in another car said they were the target of five fire bombs.

Three squad cars were hit with bricks. Shattered glass fragments littered the sidewalks and streets.

EMERGENCY PLAN

Police headquarters immediately put Emergency Plan 6 into effect and dispatched Cmdr. Holzman, "Hero Cop" of Chicago's recent Puerto Rican riots, to the scene.

A total of 21 persons were arrested, but police said nobody was injured.

Six Negro youths were arrested, almost immediately, police said, and taken to the Racine Avenue police station. They were there only a short time when King, head of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, who led a gigantic Chicago civil rights rally Sunday showed up.

King, accompanied by A. Raby, head of a Chicago civil rights organization, persuaded police to release the youths on the recognizance of the Rev. Columbus Ewing, a civil rights figure in the area.

American Negro In Unique Position

WASHINGTON—The cry about "black power" which is dividing the Negro population so sharply has occurred, we must note, as the bright hopes of last year have given way to a bleak realization that progress is stalled. The argument about "black power" is an argument about how the Negroes can restore the momentum of progress in obtaining better housing and better schools, which were the promises of 1965.

The Negro militants, who speak to the deep poverty and wretchedness of the ghettos, are arguing that progress can be pushed along only by the use of Negro votes, boycotts and angry defiance. The Negro moderates stake their hopes on votes, persuasion and nonviolent civil disobedience and demonstration.

The cruel fact of the matter is that neither tactic will work under present war conditions. The basic reality is that the 22 million Negroes, though a large number, are only about 10 per cent of the nation. Obviously they cannot coerce the huge majority, and they have no power of any kind which, if exercised recklessly, will not bring on severe reprisals and repression.

The position of the American Negro is in important respects unique. Thus, unlike the Indians who followed Gandhi, the American Negroes are not a huge majority resisting a small alien group of rulers. All forms of partition, liberation and independence which have been practiced by other racial communities in Africa and Asia are unavailable for the American Negro.

In the end there is for black and white Americans alike no alternative to coexistence, and there is no basis for coexistence except a genuine and sustained progress toward better conditions of life. This progress is possible only if the great white majority supports the progressive reforms and approves of active collaboration between the races in carrying out the reforms.

In other words, there is in the deeply interrelated problems of urbanization and Negro progress no alternative to a politics of consensus. The great promise of the Johnson election of 1964 was that our most serious internal problems would be treated by persuasion and debate and peaceful argument and that we would avoid racial and class warfare.

The hope that this highly rational and civilized way was possible rested not merely on the political skill of Mr. Johnson, but on the prospect that with proper management the expansion of the economy could continue.

As we know, the tax surpluses which were to finance the internal progress do not exist. The war is consuming them.

The Indo - Chinese war (it is no longer merely a South Vietnamese war) has destroyed the material foundations of all the hopes that preceded it. The foundations of a progressive society will not soon or easily be rebuilt.

For the President has never explained to the nation, and may not himself have fully appreciated, what are the commitments and the costs of the global crusade into which he has plunged us and of the forward strategy in the Pacific which he seems to countenance.

Black Power a Blow to Rights, Allen Says

Atlanta Mayor Ivan Allen Jr. said on nationwide television Tuesday night that the black power violence here and across the country has brought on the country's strongest reaction against the civil rights movement in recent history.

"I've never seen stronger reactionism," Allen said. "It has upset the status quo of established voting patterns."

Mayor Allen was one of the major personalties interviewed in an hour-long CBS News report on "Black Power—White Backlash."

SHOWS RIOTS

The broadcast was laced with film clips of this summer's urban race riots, strong demands by outspoken militants of the black power movement, and comments that "dramatic shifts" are becoming evident and may "tear the Democratic party apart at the teams" this election year.

Snick leader Stokely Carmichael of Atlanta said he and his followers will use "any means necessary" to achieve their ends. He said the white power structure should turn property ownerships over to the slum-dwelling Negroes.

Carmichael told a white newsman he had one message for the white community:

"The white man's burden should not have been preached in Africa but among you. . . . You are the killers of the dreams. You are the savages. Yes, it is you who have been uncivilized. Civilize yourself."

WON'T CHANGE

But the leader of non-violence among Negroes, Atlanta's Martin Luther King Jr., said that if every last Negro in the country turned to violence "I will never change" He asserted that Negroes favoring violence are a "numerical minority."

He said there would be more summers of violence and demonstrations and that the future depends "on white America to a large extent."

King was criticized by another black power advocate, New York Rep. Adam Clayton Powell, who said Negroes will "meet violence with violence—for our manhood; for our dignity."

WANTS POWER

"Let the whites keep their civil rights if it's such a precious commodity," said Daniel Watts, a Negro magazine publisher who has supported black power. "Give us money and power." He called King a "house nigger" of "neurotic liberal whites" who have built a wall between the white power structure and the Negro community.

A national poll taker, Lou Harris, said that the white backlash vote this November probably would decide as many as 20 races for congressional seats now held by freshmen congressmen.

A BIG SHIFT

This, he said, is because in 1963 about two-thirds of the educated whites favored the civil rights movement, but by the end of this summer the number had fallen to "scarcely more than one in four."

Daniel P. Moynihan, director of the Joint Center for Urban Studies at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, said the impact of the white backlash already had been felt.

"We lost the Civil Rights Act (of 1966)," he said. "The most powerful Democratic liberal voting majority . . . of the century probably . . . didn't do what it ought to have done. And the reason it did not has been fairly clear—the withdrawal of sympathy around the country."

CLEVELAND STUDY OF RIOT DEPLORED

Negroes Call Social Ills, Not Agitators, the Cause

By WALTER RUGABER
Special to The New York Times

CLEVELAND, Aug. 10 — Prominent Negro leaders were dismayed today by the charge that recent riots here were the work of agitators and revolutionaries.

The Negroes said that this appraisal, made by a county grand jury, would "camouflage" the real problems and prolong the search for a solution of serious social ills.

Several authorities, including Gov. James A. Rhodes, indicated today they were looking into the possibility of enacting stiffer laws against future upheavals.

Bertram E. Gardner, Negro director of the Municipal Community Relations Board, asserted that the grand jury accusations were an attempt by the white community to escape responsibility.

Living Conditions Noted

"Actually, the living conditions were the things that caused the riots," the city official said. "They [the rioters] didn't need any Communists to tell them they're suffering."

The grand jury spent seven days investigating the racial disorders that erupted in the Hough area and other sections of Cleveland's deteriorating East Side Negro ghetto.

Four Negroes were killed and more than 40 persons injured in the rioting, which began July 18. Nearly 2,000 National Guardsmen were called in to help restore order.

It appeared from the report that the grand jury drew heavily on information supplied by two police undercover agents and by the police subversive squad.

The head of that squad testified at length and received an ovation from the grand jury.

The grand jury outlined a number of the social problems found in the Negro areas and said these "served as the uneasy backdrop for the Cleveland riots."

Tensions Ease in Chicago Area As 2 Marches Are Postponed

By DOUGLAS ROBINSON
Special to The New York Times

CHICAGO, Aug. 10—Negro civil rights leaders announced today that they had temporarily postponed plans to hold demonstrations in two white neighborhoods.

The announcement eased tensions in the communities of Bogan, some nine miles southwest of downtown Chicago, and in Cicero, a suburb six miles to the west.

Officials of Cicero had warned that marches protesting alleged housing discrimination would set off violence that would have to be controlled by the National Guard. In Bogan, there had been unconfirmed reports that whites were arming.

In making public the decision to put off the marches, the Rev. James Bevel, a top aide to the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., said the move did not mean that plans for the demonstrations had been abandoned.

"Keep your walking shoes, don't get rid of them," he told some 200 cheeing supporters meeting at the Congregational Church in the West Side Negro ghetto.

Realty Interests Scored

Albert Raby, another aide to Dr. King and the leader of the Coordinating Council of Community Organizations here, also addressed the group in the church.

Mr. Raby said that demonstrations would come to an immediate halt once the city's real estate interests announced publicly that they accepted the city's fair housing law and "treat all Americans as human beings entitled to buy or to rent any properties listed by their agencies."

He blamed the real estate interests for the past week's demonstrations that led to attacks by whites on civil rights marchers.

"Those who continue to treat the Negro as less than a man by denying him access to housing must bear the responsibility for what happens in the present civil rights demonstrations," Raby said.

Civil rights forces picketed lion Roman Catholics, also appealed for an end to the marches.

"With a heavy heart," Archbishop Cody said in a statement, "I would call upon the leaders of the Chicago Freedom Movement to take counsel among themselves and with their supporters concerning the continuation of marches and demonstrations at this time."

Archbishop Cody, a stanch supporter of civil rights movements in the last several years, said he deplored the necessity for the appeal. He said violence by whites had caused him to issue it.

He decried what he called the "shameful reactions" of some to the "exercise of a basic freedom of our land."

"It is truly sad, indeed deplorable," the Archbishop continued, "that citizens should ever have to be asked to suspend the exercise of their rights because of evil-doing of others."

"However, in my opinion and in the opinion of many men of good will," he said, "such is the situation in which we now find ourselves."

'The Test Case'

JACKSON, Miss., Aug. 10 (UPI)—The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. said today that the firebombs of Watts had blasted the civil rights movement into a new phase and that Chicago was now the main testing ground.

"The most significant event of this year is the spread of the Negro revolution from the sprawling plantations of Mississippi and Alabama to the desolate slums and ghettos of the North," Dr. King said in his annual report to his Southern Christian Leadership Conference, in convention here.

"Chicago is the test case for S.C.L.C. and indeed the freedom movement in the North," Dr. King said. "But even though Chicago is an experiment in faith, it is also a social experiment in which the ingredients of nonviolence and justice are destined to triumph over those of injustice.

LANSING PACT SET TO EASE TENSIONS

Officials and Negro Leaders Act to Prevent Violence

LANSING, Mich., Aug. 10 (UPI)—A pact between community leaders and residents of a violence-scarred Negro neighborhood gave Michigan's capital city an uneasy peace today.

But Police Chief Charles Straiger warned, "we're not about to turn out backs on it —not until this thing cools off a bit."

City officials met once again with Negro leaders to decide whether to seal off a 36-square-block area within walking distance of the Capitol building.

Such action last night coupled, with the peace agreement, gave the area a relatively calm night after two straight evenings of hit-and-run vandalism by Negro and white gangs.

"I think we have eased the tension a great degree," Chief Straiger said.

There was one arrest last night, compared with 31 on the two previous nights. Only one incident—a fire-bomb attack on an unfinished apartment building—was reported.

The blockade was set up to keep cruising white gangs out of the area and to prevent anyone without business in the area, white or Negro, from entering.

In addition to the blockade, the pact also included promises from the city to investigate all charges of police brutality. The County Prosecutor's office was assigned the duty of checking such charges.

The city also promised to extend a recreation center program in the neighborhood from the present five-day-a-week schedule to six days. The civic center will also be opened for dances, a practice that was halted two years ago after violence broke out.

City officals said their long-range plans included building five community centers to handle recreation needs in various parts of town.

CLEVELAND, Aug. 10 — Prominent Negro leaders were dismayed today by the charge that recent riots here were the work of agitators and revolutionaries.

The Negroes said that this appraisal, made by a county grand jury, would "camouflage" the real problems and prolong the search for a solution of serious social ills.

Several authorities, including Gov. James A. Rhodes, indicated today they were looking into the possibility of enacting stiffer laws against future upheavals.

It appeared from the report that the grand jury drew heavily on information supplied by two police undercover agents and by the police subversive squad.

The head of that squad testified at length and received an ovation from the grand jury.

The grand jury outlined a number of the social problems found in the Negro areas and said these "served as the uneasy backdrop for the Cleveland riots."

But mainly its report, which was issued last night, asserted that the riots were "organized and exploited" by a group of "trained and disciplined professionals at this business."

The report said most of the trouble was caused by "young people obviously assigned, trained, and disciplined in the roles they were to play."

Agitators Present

Negroes and some white observers agreed that there were indeed agitators present during the riots and that a pattern had developed during the violence and destruction.

But, they argued, there was no solid evidence of planning and no solid evidence that radical forces were at the root of the trouble.

"I think [the grand jury report] represents generally the average white man's emotional blindness against the real causes and leads him up the flowery path to other causes that will get him off the hook," Mr. Gardner said.

"There was a great desire to find some pegs to hang [the riots) on," Mr. Gardner said. "This simplifies it. But there's no desire to handle the real problems."

Frank L. Kelker, an official of the Young Men's Christian Association, complained that often "when trouble brews, the first thing they holler is 'Communist infiltration.' The reasonable white people are putting the blame where it belongs."

Clarence H. Holmes, a lawyer, who is a board member of the local branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, said the report "missed the whole point."

"While I didn't hear the evidence, it does seem to me this report is likely to lead to offhand treatment of the problems and frustration that exist in the first place. They are very real," he said.

Cleveland has been widely criticized for a fumbling urban renewal program, poor enforcement of the housing codes, inadequate city services such as garbage collection, and second-rate schools for Negroes.

The grand jury commented:

"Impatience among the Negro people for the improvement of their citizenship is understandable, but the opinion has been expressed they may be attempting to expect too much too fast for the community to bear within an arbitrarily fixed time limit."

The panel said that because of inadequate laws the persons "responsible" for the rioting "cannot at this time be reached by specific indictments for their infamous activities."

The jury nevertheless named "some of the principal and recurring personalities" supposedly behind the riots. As did the police, it concentrated on Lewis G. Robinson and the "community center" he operates.

Mr. Robinson is director of the J. F. K. House (the initials stand for Jomo Freedom Kenyatta). He said today it had been raided by the police about a dozen times in the last two years and now was closed because of alleged health violations.

The grand jury said it had found "irrefutable evidence to the effect that Robinson pledged reciprocal aid to and with the Communist party of Ohio."

"In addition," it said, "Robinson attended many meetings at which imported Communist speakers talked and was arrested at one of these."

Mr. Robinson, who was dismissed from a city job when he announced the formation of a gun club to protect civil rights demonstrators, denied any Communist ties and branded the jury report "nothing but a lot of garbage."

Dr. King was confined to his hotel room during the day with a virus infection and a temperature of 102 degrees, but his report was read to the convention.

Precautions Set in Detroit

DETROIT, Aug. 10 (AP)—Leaves were canceled for policemen and officers were placed on 12-hour shifts today in an effort to prevent a repetition of last night's disturbances in a racially mixed area of Detroit's East Side.

The precautions were announced by Police Commissioner Ray Girardin, who said, however, that he did not expect trouble.

Commissioner Giarardin also said that ministers and other civic leaders, both Negro and white, of the section that borders the exclusive Grosse Point area had been asked to urge parents to keep their children off the streets.

A routine arrest resulted in a fight last night that drew a crowd. Windows were broken, cars belonging to both Negroes and white were stoned during a 90-minute period in which 150 policemen sealed off the area and cleared the streets.

The commissioner termed last night's incident, the first sign in a long time of any trouble involving Negroes and whites in this city of nearly two million people, as "isolated but serious."

"This could have been a big thing if people had lost their heads," he said, praising his police officers for having no physical contact with the persons involved and also praising adults in the section for taking no part.

"The older people did not subscribe to this at all," he said, adding that although the few people arrested were members of an extremist group there was "no evidence this disturbance was staged."

REISCHAUER CRITICAL OF VIETNAM POLICY

TOKYO, Aug. 9 (AP)—Ambassador Edwin O. Reischauer said Tuesday that the United States must find a better way to handle the Vietnamese problem, based on local nationalism and "very much broader international support than we are able to muster today."

Mr. Reischauer, who has resigned as Ambassador to return to teaching history at Harvard University, said in an interview that though he supported and would continue to support United States policy in Vietnam, the situation there was not a satisfactory one.

The root of the United States's difficulties in Vietnam, Mr. Reischauer declared, go back to "its grave mistake" in helping French colonialism return in 1945. He said it did not help the French to return to Indochina or the Dutch to Indonesia, both possessions before the war.

Mr. Reischauer said that in his five years as Ambassador he had "carefully avoided ever saying anything I did not myself believe."

Court Refuses to Dismiss Suit on Oath for Medicare

LOS ANGELES, Aug. 10 (AP)—Federal Court declined today to dismiss a civil action challenging the Communist disclaimer required of Medicare applicants.

The United States Attorney's office, which sought the dismissal, said some 6,000 Medicare applications a week were being held up pending court decision on the question.

A. L. Wirin, counsel for the American Civil Liberties Union, who filed the suit, said the disclaimer violated constitutional rights of freedom of speech and association.

But District Judge Thurmond Clarke refused to dismiss the case. He also upheld a temporary restraining order barring the question until a three-judge panel rules at a hearing on Aug. 15. The action was filed in behalf of Mrs. Alda T. Reed.

Race Conflict Isn't All Bad, Urban League's Young Says

"Racial conflict does not mean we're going backward," National Urban League director Whitney Young Jr. said here Thursday night.

Whitney Young

"The riots make us all look bad," Young told newsmen after he addressed 46 graduates of the E. K. Jones Volunteers in Service to America (Vista) Training Center.

"The counter reaction—whites stoning Negroes—that's going on in Chicago is good in one way. The real hate there is now coming into the open," said Young. "Their real attitudes are now being revealed."

"Here were people who were telling us that all they were interested in were things like local schools," he said. "They had told us, 'Sure, we're for civil rights.' We've found racists in the North just as brutal as any in the South."

Asked about the Negro participation in the riots, Young replied, "I never said that social change would be painless. All that these Negroes want is some tangible evidence of progress."

"We know now that no community can feel immune to these riots," he said. "There will always be someone to stir them up. We learned how from white demagogues in the South who did the same with the poor, uneducated whites.

"Now, people tell us that they're not going to support civil rights because of the riots," Young said. "No one talks about the disproportionate number of Negro boys dying in Viet Nam and says that they'll back civil rights because of it."

Georgia Fifth District Rep. Charles L. Weltner, the main speaker at the graduation, said afterward that he was dismayed by the qualification of klansman Calvin Craig for a seat on the Fulton County Democratic Executive Committee. "Our party disavows extremists," Weltner said.

Whites and Police Clash in Chicago

Thousands of rioting whites clashed with club-swinging policemen in Chicago Sunday night after three separate civil rights marches into all-white neighborhoods.

At least 16 persons — including five policemen — were injured and police arrested 21 persons during the melee.

Police swarmed into Marquette Park on the city's Southwest Side and knocked several persons to the ground with clubs as thousands of white persons stormed through the park.

The park finally was emptied and officers denied anyone entrance.

The violence erupted after a leader of the American Nazi party called on white persons to march into Negro areas.

The violence came after the civil rights marches into Gage Park, Bogan and Jefferson Park nieghborhoods to protest alleged housing discrimination.

Marquette Park was outside the area of the civil rights marches, but the demonstrators were met with volleys of rocks and bottles which resulted in some injuries and several arrests.

John Patler of the American Nazi party earlier had told whites in the park they should prepare for "the white revolution."

Soon after his talk, riotin white persons roamed the par and hurled bottles and rocks a passing cars of Negroes.

Squads of policemen withdrew to regroup, and when reinforced, swarmed down a hill into the melee. Officers fired shots into the air.

Angry whites yelling, "We want white power!" and "Kill the niggers!" bombarded a caravan of cars carrying marchers into the Gage Park area.

As civil rights leaders prepared to meet tonight to discuss plans for their next demonstration in Chicago, Rep. Roman C. Pucinski, D-Ill., said he would introduce a bill in Congress which would give courts the rights to limit the number of marchers in civil rights demonstrations.

Elsewhere on the racial scene:

More than 3,000 whites at a Ku Klux Klan rally in Raleigh, N.C., jeered a small group of Negroes who sat in on the meeting. But helmeted officers kept the session under control.

Six persons, including a klan security guard, were arrested.

At Detroit, four Negroes charged with inciting to riot in the aftermath of three days of violence pleaded innocent before Record's Court Judge John A. Ricca. The judge set a hearing for the four, described by police as members of militant civil rights groups.

A relative calm settled over Detroit, Lansing, Ypsilanti and Muskegon, Mich., scenes of outbreaks of violence last week.

Police at Philadelphia, Pa., launched a search for three officials of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, a civil rights group, on warrants charging them with the possession of explosives and conspiracy.

A fourth civil rights worker, Winston Early, surrendered to police and was questioned.

The warrants were issued after four other persons were arrested in police raids of four locations described as meeting places for civil rights groups. Officers said they discovered dynamite sticks in one of the locations.

The officers issued arrest warrants for Fred Meely, Morris Ruffin and George Anderson, all SNCC workers.

In Charlotte, N.C., a Negro man was shot to death and three other Negroes were wounded in a residential area. Police charged a white man, Charles W. Willis, 23, with murder and assault with a deadly weapon with intent to kill. The dead man was Sylvester Patterson, 35.

In Grenada, Miss., police arrested 19 Negroes when First Baptist Church ushers complained the group would not leave after being blocked from entering the church.

A crowd of about 300 young persons jammed an intersection in a predominantly Negro area of Los Angeles and threw rocks, bottles and garbage. The group gathered as police attempted to remove a man standing in the middle of a street blocking traffic, officers said.

In New York, police said a Negro guard at a Far Rockaway, Queens, diner allegedly struck a white man and his pregnant wife with his nightstick, precipitating 20 minutes of insults and punches among a large crowd of Negroes and whites.

Small Earthquake Hits Texas Town

KERMIT, Tex. (AP) — A small earthquake, centered about 30 miles west of the Texas-New Mexico border, caused minor damage in this West Texas town Sunday.

Windows were broken and several street signs were knocked over. There were no injuries. The quake was recorded at 9:26 a.m. It also was felt at Wink, eight miles south of here.

The quake lasted from two to five seconds, said Nick Brown, news director of radio station KERB at Kermit. He said earthquakes are not uncommon here, but this was the most severe one he had experienced.

WHITE OPPOSITION TO NEGROES RISES

Survey Finds Even Peaceful Protests Are Opposed

By EDWARD C. BURKS

White prejudice against the Negro has not slackened substantially in the last three years, and the white man, resentful of rioting, now opposes even peaceful Negro demonstrations, a nationwide survey has indicated.

The survey, conducted by Newsweek, was published in the magazine yesterday.

Although most of the Negroes interviewed reported gains in their status and the whites interviewed expressed sympathy with Negro aspirations, the questioning revealed a number of sore points. These had to do with such critical issues as the Negro's drive for integrated housing and the white objection to social contact.

Newsweek sent teams of the Louis Harris polling organization across the country — including 113 Negro interviewers—to question 1,059 Negroes and 1,088 whites from widely varying economic and geographical backgrounds.

Poll's Findings

They found that:

¶About 88 per cent of whites object to having a Negro family next door. (A similar survey in 1963 showed 51 per cent opposed. In the South, 69 per cent are now opposed).

¶About 88 per cent of white would resent it if a teen-age child of theirs dated a Negro.

¶About 16 per cent of whites in general and 42 per cent of Southern whites object to sitting next to a Negro in a restaurant; 21 per cent and 56 per cent object to using the same restroom; 16 and 44 per cent mind sitting beside a Negro on a bus; 28 and 54 per cent object to trying on clothing a Negro has tried on.

¶About 63 per cent of whites think all demonstrations are harmful. (Three years ago it was 53 per cent.)

¶About 79 per cent of whites would have strong objections to the marriage of a friend or relative to a Negro (84 per cent three years ago).

¶Although upper-income and suburban whites tended to be far more liberal—57 per cent of them supported protest demonstrations compared to 24 per cent among "underprivileged" whites—45 per cent of the upper-income whites felt that Negroes "small differently."

¶Half the whites believe Negroes have looser morals and 43 per cent believe "Negroes want to live off the handout."

Summarizing, the magazine found that "tolerance flowers in the suburbs" but shrinks among the poor whites of the city, who feel even more abandoned by Government than Negroes.

The Negroes interviewed rejected by a large margin any black power program that means going it alone, without white support, or abandoning integration as a goal.

Two of every three Negroes questioned (and three out of four in the South) said things had improved for them since 1963, especially in schooling, jobs, voting registration freedom and public accommodations. But housing, especially in the Northern big city ghettos, remained a sore point that for the majority had not been alleviated.

Tiny Church in Britain Seen As Chancel of Earlier One

EASTBOURNE, England (Religious News Service)—Lullington Church, which has for ages been celebrated as England's smallest parish church, has been found to be the remaining part of an earlier church destroyed by fire some time around the 12th century.

The discovery was announced by an archaeological team headed by Alec Barr-Hamilton of Sussex County Archaeological Society.

Layers of newly-found ashes are evidence of the fire that destroyed most of the original church, which had a tower, a nave and a chancel. The chancel escaped and the archeologists say they have now confirmed that the existing Lullington church is part of the original chancel.

Lullington church is Anglican and measures only 16 feet by 16 feet. It seats 20 people. Set in a peaceful glade, it is still used for monthly services. Although the village of Lullington disappeared centuries ago, the area attracts hundreds of tourists.

BLACK POWER PARLEY MAPPED FOR OCTOBER

Representative Adam Clayton Powell announced Sunday that a national conference on black power could be held sometime in October.

Planning sessions for the conference, which the Harlem Democrat likened to a "black constitutional convention," will be held Saturday at the House Office Building in Washington to "set up definitions, goals and guidelines which can operate within the framework of the concept of black power,'" he said.

The Negro Representative told reporters in the Abyssinian Baptist Church at 132 West 138th street that 53 of 71 Negro leaders he had invited had agreed to attend adding, "but I don't think any of the old civil rights leaders are coming."

Asked which leaders would not attend, Mr. Powell mentioned only Whitney M. Young, executive director of the National Urban League, whom he first referred to as "Whitey." "I mean Whitney," Mr. Powell said amid laughter from aides.

Representative Powell said the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., head of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, was going through an "agonizing reappraisal" of his previous stand against "black power" and had changed his position on the parley "twice this month." Mr. Powell said he believed Mr. King would eventually join the "black power" movement.

Commenting on Bayard Rustin's recent remarks that the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee and the Congress of Racial Equality were on the wane, Mr. Powell said:

"They are cutting the umbilical cord between themselves and the white liberals. "Whenever you cut the umbilical cord there is a chance of infant mortality but unless it's cut the child will never grow up."

Race Pressures

On the Streets And in Congress

On the surface, as the events of the past week unfolded in Washington and in the South, it was as though the clock had been turned back to September, 1957.

Then, Federal troops were rushed to Little Rock, Ark., when Gov. Orval E. Faubus defied Federal court orders to integrate schools and mob violence was turned against Negro children. Then, Congress was embroiled in debate over a civil rights bill; its passage marked the first major piece of legislation in the civil rights field in 82 years.

Last week there was mob violence in Grenada, Miss. (pop. 8,000), over school integration, and in Washington there was acrimonious debate over civil rights legislation.

But there are vast differences between 1957 and 1966. The nation —including the South—has come a long way in the past nine years in the civil rights area. At the time of Little Rock, school integration was just beginning and the crisis was over 12 children. Today, integration — while still of the token variety in most communities—is making steady progress in much of the South. Nine years ago, there was a direct confrontation between state authorities and the Federal Government; in Grenada, a combination of state forces and Federal presence—in the form of Justice Department agents — armed with laws, not troops, quickly put down the local resistance.

When Grenada's schools opened last Monday morning, they were under court orders to integrate, and 150 Negro children were in the classrooms. But outside there was an angry white mob, and when the classes recessed at noon, the men —egged on by cursing women and watched by city policemen who made no move to intervene—attacked the children and reporters with chains, ax handles and pipes. Gov. Paul Johnson dispatched state patrolmen to restore order; and Federal District Judge Claude F. Clayton, calling the mob violence "savage, senseless and futile," ordered city officials to protect the Negro children and arrest rioters in conformity with Federal laws that have been upheld by the Supreme Court. By last night, more than a dozen Grenada whites had been arrested and warrants were out for others.

Grenada may have substantiated what many persons — including some civil rights leaders — have been saying recently: that most of the legislation to handle Southern problems is now on the books and that—insofar as legislation itself goes—only loopholes need to be closed. The legislative attack that lies ahead is on Northern, and national, problems. This year Congress made its first major move in that direction and then backed off.

Last April, President Johnson proposed the Civil Rights Bill of 1966. Much of it was directed at closing the Southern legal loopholes — among them, jury discrimination and new penalties for interfering with civil rights activities. But Title IV was aimed at a major national dilemma—discrimination in the sale or rental of all types of dwellings. In the House of Representatives, this was watered down before passage to exclude private residences and certain types of apartments, removing from coverage about 60 per cent of the nation's dwellings.

In the Senate, however, the bill, even as amended, was in trouble from the start. The past combination of forces and events that had produced legislative redress—public demand for action stirred by anti-civil rights violence in the South, the unity of the civil rights movement, a feeling of a need to right old wrongs—was not present.

Instead there were signs of a strong "white backlash" fueled by riots in the Negro ghettos during the summer, and by the rising cry of "black power" from Negro militants. Some Senators said their mail—and this is an election year —was running 40-to-1 against the bill.

Moreover, the unity of the civil rights movement had dissolved, both on the question of general tactics, and on the specific value of the housing bill, as amended. Last week, the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. declared, "They feel we are split up. We can't say to Congress anymore: 'You've got to pass this bill.'"

When debate started in the Senate week before last, Majority Leader Mike Mansfield found he could not even raise a quorum—51 Senators — on some days, something he called "disgraceful." The fate of the bill seemed to hinge on two men—President Johnson and Republican Minority Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen who, if he favored passage, could round up enough Republican votes to break a Southern filibuster and insure the margin of victory.

President's Role

But while the President urged support for the bill, there was little of the sense of urgency and fervor he displayed when he demanded passage of previous civil rights measures.

And Senator Dirksen, who had supported the last two civil rights bills, was strenuously opposed this time. He called the bill "a package of mishchief," and said it was "unconstitutional."

Some critics, in fact, felt that both the President and Mr. Dirksen, sensitive to the political winds, were doing a bit of buck-passing on the question of responsibility for getting the bill passed.

Thus it was without any hope for victory that Senator Mansfield called late Wednesday for a vote on closure—to cut off a Southern filibuster. The motion failed, by 10 votes, 54 Senators for and 42 against. With 96 Senators in the chamber, Mr. Mansfield needed 64 ayes, or two-thirds of those present and voting. Though Mr. Mansfield has called for another vote on closure for tomorrow, he has scant hope of picking up enough new votes for victory.

What are the gains and losses, political and otherwise, in the conflict that led to the Congressional defeat of the Civil Rights Bill of 1966?

White backlash sentiment is certain to be pleased by the outcome. "It would be strange," Senator Dirksen said in talking about Republican prospects in November, "if we didn't gain and gain substantially."

But others are not so sure. Civil rights groups are angry, and their weight may be felt in big-city states. Liberal Republicans, like New York's Senator Jacob Javits, are convinced that the "party of Lincoln" can only suffer by identification with the white backlash.

Civil Rights Drive Is Slowing

This article is the first of three on the recent setbacks for the civil rights movement.

Support for Negro and His Problems Found to Wane

By GENE ROBERTS

Public support for the Negro and his problems is waning, white opposition is growing, and the civil rights movement is falling into increasing disarray.

Many white liberals are confused; others have become preoccupied with Vietnam. And white moderates, disturbed by Negro riots and mounting pressure for housing desegregation, are becoming apathetic, or hostile.

These developments, which emerged clearly in a recent series of interviews across the nation, have touched off a wave of unease among politicians.

In Washington, Congress is ready to kill a civil rights bill for the first time in three years, and some Presidential advisers say Mr. Johnson is convinced that the public mood will not permit any "big and bold" programs for Negroes.

It appears to be a major turning point for the Negro, who until this year had been gaining momentum in the social "revolution" that he began in late 1955 with the Montgomery bus boycotts.

For many civil rights enthusiasts, the question now is not whether the Negro can win major new legislation, but whether he can muster enough political strength to force strong enforcement of existing civil rights legislation and prevent the erosion of the gains he made when the revolution was at its peak.

Already, some who want the revolution to rush on to "completion" see parallels between now and the end of last century's Reconstruction period, when the North lost interest in the Negro.

"One of the fundamental things that didn't happen in Reconstruction was land distribution," said the Rev. Mr. James Breeden, assistant director of the Commission on Religion and Race for the National Council of Churches.

"That would have its parallel today in our failure to turn over significant economic resources to the dispossessed," he said, adding that, with the mood of the country as it is, "there is not going to be any meaningful economic program" for Negroes.

With uncertainty rippling across the political scene, there is little reason to think he is wrong.

In California, the possibility of a white backlash is a major concern of Gov. Edmund G. Brown in his campaign for reelection against Ronald Reagan. In Maryland, open housing was the major issue in the Democratic gubernatorial primary.

Politicians Uneasy—New Aid Plans Are Held Unlikely

Only a few months ago, Georgia Liberals were saying proudly that the state had "turned the corner" on the race issue. But a little later, Liberal Ellis Arnall, a candidate in the Democratic gubernatorial primary, was concerned over a reaction to Negro riots and was lacing a plea for "law and order" into almost every campaign speech.

In Alabama, advisers to Gov. George C. Wallace say mail from Northern admirers is "piling in" and that the ardent segregationist is certain to seek the Presidency in 1968.

"Backlash" is the word many politicians use to describe what is happening among the electorate. But the term implies a sudden reversal of sentiment, and there are indications that attitudes on race are more subtle.

"It's not so much a backlash," said Dr. Thomas F. Pettigrew, a social psychologist at Harvard. Rather, he said, it is an "out from under the rocks phenomenon."

He said the nation was seeing a "real mobilization of the hate that was always there," and that it was having a political impact because it was "coming during a period in which the civil rights coalition has lost its mobilization."

Many liberals remain committed to the Negro, but speak out less because they do not know how to solve the newer, more difficult, problems. Many say they are not getting the leadership they had expected from civil rights organizations.

Meanwhile, many Northern whites, who were silently opposed, or indifferent, to civil rights demands are speaking out because they feel themselves personally challenged.

For others, liberals and moderates, Vietnam has replaced civil rights as the No. 1 issue. Some Northerners have "cooled on civil rights because of opposition from the Southern Christian Leadership Conference and the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee to the war in Vietnam.

Still others, who identified with the Negro when he was under physical attack in the South, switched their identification when riots erupted in Northern cities.

"Civil rights leaders," said Nathan Perlmutter, director of domestic affairs for the American Jewish Committee, "usually say that it [the lack of momentum] is due to whites thinking the battle is over and sitting back."

"This may be part of the problem," he said, "but another part is white reaction to black nationalism, riots and 'hate whitey' talk."

"The liberal white man knows that he is as much 'whitey' to a maurading hater as the bigoted white man and this realization is having its effect," Mr. Perlmutter said.

In St. Louis, however, the issue that angers Leo Ellison, a 69-year-old truck driver, is housing desegregation. "Black power don't bother me none," he said. "They can shout all they want—black power, white power—just so long as they stay away from me."

At Harvard University, Bernie Franks, a graduate student, plopped into an easy chair to relax from an exam and talked about a "lack of goals and direction" in the civil rights movement.

[illegible] of students here would [illegible]

said, the American Synagogue Council had no special commission on race because it was not needed to arouse Jewish support for civil rights activity in the South. But recently one was established to prepare Jewish neighborhoods for "integration in their own backyards."

"I don't want to make the picture sound too bleak," Rabbi Seigman said, "because Jewish support for civil rights is still high, but we do have a problem with disengagement and we are trying to meet it."

Organized labor is wrestling with some of the same problems as the church groups, although the civil rights effort of the industrial union department of the American Federation of Labor-Congress of Industrial Organizations is increasing.

The department has assigned full-time workers to the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King's civil rights campaign in Chicago and has stepped up its drive to organize migrant farm workers.

But, says Jack Conway, the department's executive director, "when you get into things like fair housing or raising taxes [illegible] needs of the cities, ily Life," which was prepared for the President by Daniel P. Moynihan, a former assistant Secretary of Labor, was widely attacked for putting "too much family was disintegrating and blame" on the Negro for his problems. It said that the Negro was becoming increasingly matriarchal.

Although Mr. Moynihan declines to comment on his conversations with Mr. Johnson, he heatedly denies that the report did anything more than to describe the dilemma of many poverty-stricken Negroes and to set the stage for Federal action.

"We had this Congress with us," he said. "We had the money, and the moment, and we missed the opportunity. Now I'm afraid we are going to get a right-wing reaction . . . You cannot mistake a real withdrawal of sentiment in the North."

However, a liberal who works closely with Presidential advisers on civil rights contends that "it's easy to overemphasize the importance of the Moynihan controversy on President Johnson's current attitude on civil rights."

"It is true enough that he doesn't want to stir the pot on civil rights at this particular time," he said, "but the main reason for this is that he has his hands full on Vietnam, and he senses that any big program wouldn't have popular support, at least for the time being."

Certainly, popular support is fading after reaching an emotional pitch during the crisis in Selma, Ala., early last year.

"There is something about the Western mind that makes us believe that suffering purifies," an intellectual who, was in the Government said, continuing:

"Selma was perfect last year for putting whites on the side of the Negro. That sheriff down there not only knew what to do but when to do it — just in time for Huntley-Brinkley."

"After Selma, there was more than enough support to get the voting rights bill through Congress," he continued, "but then what happened within 48 hours after the bill was signed into law?"

"Watts blew up, and there were the Negroes — the very people we had loved because they were oppressed — in the role of the aggressor. The mental adjustment was just too much for some white people and we lost them after that."

The big question among white liberals is: How deep does white disengagement go, and where does it leave the Negro?

Could it be the first step toward the kind of almost total disengagement that took place in the late nineteenth century when the North stood by while the South stripped away the gains that the Negro made?

Dr. Pettigrew of Harvard believes that, while the country may hesitate for 10 years or more, it will be reluctant to go backward.

"For one thing," he says, "the Negro has learned to riot and that may serve as a brake. And then there is a matter of the Negro vote, which is strategically placed in Northern cities. The politician may be able to avoid giving the Negro all he wants in the next few years, but he will not be able to offend him."

But among other liberals there is concern that there may be serious slippage for the Negro.

"The fearful thing is that whites might come to look on the racial problem as mainly a law enforcement problem, and that they will use the police to contain the Negro to the ghetto," said Mr. Dunbar of the Field Foundation.

"That way, whites would be able to sleep peacefully in the suburbs and let Negores riot among themselves. The tragedy is that we might be able to rock along that way for a generation or so."

South, switched their identification when riots erupted in Northern cities.

"Civil rights leaders," said Nathan Perlmutter, director of domestic affairs for the American Jewish Committee, "usually say that it [the lack of momentum] is due to whites thinking the battle is over and sitting back."

"This may be part of the problem," he said, "but another part is white reaction to black nationalism, riots and 'hate whitey' talk."

In St. Louis, however, the issue that angers Leo Ellison, a 69-year-old truck driver, is housing desegregation. "Black power don't bother me none," he said. "They can shout all they want—black power, white power—just so long as they stay away from me."

At Harvard University, Bernie Franks, a graduate student, plopped into an easy chair to relax from an exam and talked about a "lack of goals and direction" in the civil rights movement.

"A lot of students here would like to do something, but they don't know what to do," he said. "I think you could get as many volunteers out of here today for civil rights projects as you ever could. The problem is — nobody is asking for volunteers."

In many parts of the nation, however, liberal enthusiasm is ebbing. In New York, anti-Semitism among Negroes disturbs the Jewish community, which has long been the financial backbone of the civil rights movement.

"It isn't so much that the anti-Semitic remarks of a LeRoi Jones are appalling," said Mr. Perlmutter, "it is the silence on him by Negro leaders."

At the headquarters of the American Synagogue Council in New York, Rabbi Henry Seigman, the executive vice president, said the "Mount Vernon incident" [in which a Negro member of the Congress of Racial Equality said the trouble with Hitler was that he did not kill enough jews] had a "tremendous impact on the Jewish community."

"Most of us realize that we can't use incidents like this as an excuse and that we have to face up to our own responsibilities," he said, "but Negro leaders could make our job easier by recognizing that anti-Semitism is a real problem."

Financial support by Christians for church-related human relations organizations, as well as for the civil rights movement, has also declined.

The Delta Ministry, which was organized two years ago as a civil rights arm of the National Council of Churches, fell $150,000 short of meeting its budget in its first year of existence. It has not made up the deficit and it is cutting back its programs.

Contributions to the Commission on Religion and Race of the National Council of Churches have plunged 25 to 50 per cent this year.

And contributions to the Commission on Religion and Race of the predominantly white United Presbyterian Church have yet to reach $100,000 this year, compared with $131,000 last year and $196,000 in 1964.

"There is no doubt that we are in a cooling-off period as far as the white community is concerned," said Gayraud S. Wilmore Jr., the Negro executive director of the commission.

"What I have seen," he said, "is a kind of sadness on the part of white liberals—a sadness that their contribution was not highly regarded by the civil rights organizations."

In some of the letters reaching the Rev. Mr. John Morris, executive director of the Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity, there is not only a note of sadness, but also of disenchantment.

In part, he said, this is because of the black power philosphy of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee and of CORE, and in part because of demonstrations in the North.

"As long as the civil rights movement was confined to the South, you got few complaints," he said, "but when there's activity in the North, someone's toes usually get stepped on."

For years, Rabbi Seigman said, the American Synagogue Council had no special commission on race because it was not needed to arouse Jewish support for civil rights activity in the South. But recently one was established to prepare Jewish neighborhoods for "integration in their own backyards."

"I don't want to make the picture sound too bleak," Rabbi Seigman said, "because Jewish support for civil rights is still high, but we do have a problem with disengagement and we are trying to meet it."

Organized labor is wrestling with some of the same problems as the church groups, although the civil rights effort of the industrial union department of the American Federation of Labor-Congress of Industrial Organizations is increasing.

The department has assigned full-time workers to the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King's civil rights campaign in Chicago and has stepped up its drive to organize migrant farm workers.

But, says Jack Conway, the department's executive director, "when you get into things like fair housing or raising taxes to meet the needs of the cities, labor people react just like individuals in general."

"I think the nation has to face up to the fact that it has to do more for the Negro—particularly in terms of economic programs — and I think it will face up to it," he said.

However, Mr. Conway said that a program just had not emerged yet. This failure by civil rights leaders to agree on an economic program is a constant complaint of white liberals.

"What happened at the last White House Conference on Civil Rights?" one influential liberal snorted. "They came up with a $100-million price tag and 80 pages of proposals and stuff. You can't sell a price tag, and how in the hell do you sell 80 pages of anything?"

His complaint is only a part of the disenchantment, much of it still voiced in whispers, that is developing among white liberals.

Congress and the President would have accepted a civil rights bill "twice as sweeping" as the one just put aside by the Senate, a man colse to the White House declared, if civil rights leaders had put aside their differences and given legislation their "all out" support.

But, the man said, "people like Stokely Carmichael [chairman of S.N.C.C.] and Floyd McKissick [executive director of CORE] blew it by taking the attitude that they had had enough of the white man's laws — that the laws didn't do any good. Even Martin Luther King sounds like that at times."

Still, there is a reluctance among many liberals to criticize the black power philosophy, which they often interpret as an understandable feeling among Negroes that they cannot rely on whites and must work within their own community to develop skills, economic strength and political power.

Much liberal frustration is caused by President Johnson, who, in a speech at Howard University in May of 1965, said the time had come for an all-out national effort to eradicate poverty and to shore up Negro family life. Now, however, many feel he has retreated from this position.

"Everywhere you look with people in positions of power and authority, they have things they regard as more important," said Leslie Dunbar, director of the Field Foundation, which has underwritten much civil rights work. "With President Johnson it's Vietnam. The situation now requires the kind of educational effort and leadership that only the President can give."

And Dr. Pettigrew of Harvard added:

"The team is gone. You go to Washington and you find people milling around in confusion.

One occasional adviser to the President contended that Mr. Johnson had been thinking in terms of an economic program "on the order of the family allowances that the Scandinavian countries have." But then, he said, "all of those people pulled the rug out from under him by ganging up on the Moynihan report."

The "Report on Negro Family Life," which was prepared for the President by Daniel P. Moynihan, a former assistant Secretary of Labor, was widely attacked for putting "too much family was disintegrating and blame" on the Negro for his problems. It said that the Negro was becoming increasingly matriarchal.

Although Mr. Moynihan declines to comment on his conversations with Mr. Johnson, he heatedly denies that the report did anything more than to describe the dilemma of many poverty-stricken Negroes and to set the stage for Federal action.

"We had this Congress with us," he said. "We had the money, and the moment, and we missed the opportunity. Now I'm afraid we are going to get a right-wing reaction . . . You cannot mistake a real withdrawal of sentiment in the North."

However, a liberal who works closely with Presidential advisers on civil rights contends that "it's easy to overemphasize the importance of the Moynihan controversy on President Johnson's current attitude on civil rights."

"It is true enough that he doesn't want to stir the pot on civil rights at this particular time," he said, "but the main reason for this is that he has his hands full on Vietnam, and he senses that any big program wouldn't have popular support, at least for the time being."

Certainly, popular support is fading after reaching an emotional pitch during the crisis in Selma, Ala., early last year.

"There is something about the Western mind that makes us believe that suffering purifies," an intellectual who, was in the Government said, continuing:

"Selma was perfect last year for putting whites on the side of the Negro. That sheriff down there not only knew what to do but when to do it — just in time for Huntley-Brinkley."

"After Selma, there was more than enough support to get the voting rights bill through Congress," he continued, "but then what happened within 48 hours after the bill was signed into law?"

"Watts blew up, and there were the Negroes — the very people we had loved because they were oppressed — in the role of the aggressor. The mental adjustment was just too

Following is the last of three articles on recent setbacks for the civil rights movement:

By JOHN HERBERS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20—"Go into Chicago today in any home, any bar, any barbership and you will find people are not talking about Vietnam or rising prices or prosperity. They are talking about Martin Luther King and how they [Negroes] are moving in on us and what's going to happen to our neighborhoods."

The speaker was a liberal Democrat, Representative Roman C. Pucinski, and he was explaining how it had become a political burden for him to support even watered-down civil rights legislation.

Mr. Pucinski, who represents a white district in northwest Chicago, has strong ties with organized labor and the Johnson Administration. In the past he has voted for strong civil rights bills.

This year, he supported the Administration's civil rights bill, which was killed in the Senate yesterday. But he also supported the amendment that exempted most individual home sales, or 60 per cent of the nation's housing units, from the nondiscrimination provisions of the legislation. Furthermore, he openly condemned street demonstrations for open housing.

Fear of Backlash Thinning the Ranks of Liberal Bipartisan Supporters of the Civil Rights Movement

Now, in a district that previously had been considered safely Democratic, Mr. Pucinski is reported to be in trouble in the November election, and housing segregation is the chief issue. He and his opponent, John J. Hoellen, a Republican, are debating who will do the most to preserve the character of the neighborhoods in the 11th District.

Mr. Pucinski's changing role in racial matters is indicative of a new political climate spawned by another long hot summer.

Violence in the cities, the new militancy among Negroes, increased white resistance to racial integration in the North and the disaffection of white liberals with the civil rights movement have had these effects in Washington:

¶Republican leaders have made "riots in the streets" a political issue. And, in a departure from bipartisan support of civil rights, they opposed open housing legislation. This has been interpreted by some as a new appeal to the "white backlash."

¶For the first time the Administration has taken sides in the civil rights movement, joining moderate Negro leaders in opposition to advocates of "black power." President Johnson has coupled pleas for law and order with his call for social programs that attack the cause of unrest.

¶Some liberals in the House now talk like Southern conservatives as they condemn demonstrations and charge that subversives have infiltrated the civil rights movement.

¶Racial turmoil has had a chilling effect on civil rights legislation, notably the civil rights bill that died in the Senate yesterday.

A Western Republican, whose district is 92 per cent white, watched a television program the other day in which Stokely Carmichael, chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, and other civil rights leaders talked of the possibility of Negro uprisings.

"What those fellows said shook me up," the Congressman said. "I'm sure it shook up the people in my district, too, and I expect they will register their protests by writing me letters cussing at me for voting for the civil rights bill."

In an election year, the House reflects to some degree the mood of the country. Members spend time in their districts and are sensitive to the demands of the voters.

Interviews with Congressmen from all regions of the nation show that, in many districts outside the South, whites are upset. Generally, it is violence, not the advancement of civil rights, that disturbs them.

United Press International

Representative Roman C. Pucinski is among the legislators whose role in racial matters is now changing.

But some Representatives say they are having more and more trouble explaining to their constituents that the two do not go together. And white reaction is strongest in areas where there has been violence or militant efforts by Negroes to integrate housing.

An analysis of the voting on the civil rights bill showed that the traditional posture of the House had not been greatly altered. But many liberals are much less enthusiastic about the cause now than when the struggle was confined to the South.

Mr. Pucinski is an example. He is a member of the House Labor and Education Committee and, according to Americans for Democratic Action, he voted the liberal position last year 74 per cent of the time.

Nevertheless, when Mr. Pucinski thinks of his district he thinks of row after row of small houses occupied by Poles or other ethnic groups from Eastern Europe who spend Sundays manicuring their homes and lawns.

"They came to this country with the love for the land and that 30-by-125-foot lot means everything to them," he said. "I know people in Chicago who have moved three or four times [to escape deteriorating neighborhoods] and now they are saying, 'I'm not going to move again. I'm going to make my stand here.' "

"It's fear," Mr. Pucinski said, "and lack of communications." He said Dr. King's demonstrations had attracted unkempt people and that when whites in Chicago see them "they think these are the people who want to move in next door."

Mr. Pucinski introduced legislation to authorize Federal Courts to limit demonstrations by number of participants, times and places.

"The demonstrations may be intended ot be nonviolent," he said. "But can the organizers truly be nonviolent, knowing in their minds and hearts that their conduct will assuredly precipitate violence in others?"

This, or course, is precisely what Southerners have been saying for years as demonstrations in that region attracted violent whites on a rather regular basis. Southerners are amused and somewhat pleased to hear Northern liberals take up the arguments they had made without avail.

The Cleveland riots this summer stirred a wave of white reaction throughout Ohio, according to Congressmen from that state. The most outspoken on the issue is Wayne L. Hays, a Democrat who represents a district along the Ohio River.

Americans for Constitutional Action said Mr. Hays voted with conservatives only 5 per cent of the time last year, while Americans for Democratic Action rated his liberal voting record at 63 per cent. He voted for the civil rights bill after opposing the open housing section in fiery speeches.

The other day, after reading in The Washington Post that Negroes who participated in a disturbance in the capital lived in hot, crowded public housing infested by roaches, Mr. Hays made this statement on the floor:

"I would just like to say that when these homes were built they did not come furnished with roaches. I have public housing in my district, and the administrator sees to it that the tenants observe simple sanitation, and if they do not, they find themselves without a place to live. What are we to do now? Go out and clean houses for these people?"

Many Representatives have expressed concern about the black power movement.

"Most members of the House consider Stokely Carmichael and Floyd McKissick nothing more than anarchists," one Congressman said.

Because of this concern, Adam Clayton Powell, the Harlem Democrat, met with Representatives and their aides one day in August to explain black power.

"These are a new breed of cats," Mr. Powell said. "They hiss A. Philip Randolph. They boo Martin Luther King. They even picket my church."

He said black power symbolized a new militancy that had caught the imagination of young Negroes, that established Negro leaders could not control it, and that the country would have to deal with it as best it could.

Local Ordinances Help

There seems to be less racial tensions in districts that have strong state or local civil rights ordinances. For instance, Weston E. Vivian of Ann Arbor, Mich., represents an area that contains both strong pockets of the new left and the John Birch Society, as well as transplanted whites from Alabama. Nevertheless, Mr. Vivian, a Democrat, supported a strong open housing bill.

He has seen an angry white reaction to this "in the virulent look on people's faces," but he said he had not found much expression in the political arena. He said an open housing ordinance in Ann Arbor took the edge off what could have been an ugly fight over the bill in Congress.

Republican leaders, meanwhile, are blaming the Administration for the violence this summer. After voting against the open housing section, Gerald R. Ford of Michigan, the House minority leader, spoke at the Illinois State Fair and called the Democrats "the party with the big riots in the streets."

"The Democratic party promised big but failed to deliver," he said. "That's why we are in trouble now. . . . How long are we going to abdicate law and order — the backbone of any civilization — in favor of a soft social theory that the man who heaves a brick through your window or tosses a fire bomb into your car is simply the misunderstood and underprivileged product of a broken home?"

Before he submitted his civil rights bill to Congress last May, President Johnson called Negro leaders into his office and told them the legislation faced strong opposition in Congress.

In appealing for their help, the President told them about his school days in Texas. He and other schoolboys ganged up one day to "whip the teacher," but when young Lyndon opened the attack he discovered to his horror that the other boys had turned and run.

"Now don't leave me to whip the teacher alone," Mr. Johnson pleaded with the civil rights leaders.

The Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, an affiliation of organizations interested in human rights, lobbied as usual for the bill. But more militant Negro leaders opposed it as too weak and many of previous advocates of civil rights were silent.

Meanwhile, violence in the streets continued. Late in the summer, a spokesman for the Administration said, the White House became concerned about widespread discontent and disorder.

"People in and out of Government, many of them Negro leaders, said they felt that the President, as the nation's political leader, should say more about responsible civil rights action," the spokesman said.

On his tour through New England on the weekend of Aug. 21, President Johnson said people had the right to "protest the conditions of their lives," but that social progress was difficult in a "society torn by violence and discord."

Meantime, the ambitious recommendations of the White House Conference on Civil Rights, which called for vast expenditures for education, welfare and public works, were shelved, at least for the time being. An interdepartmental committee has been appointed to study them.

A Democrat in the House, who has been close to the Administration and has supported the President, says:

"I predict that civil rights and social legislation has passed its zenith. The Democrats will lose at least 30 or 40 seats in the House this year, and it is likely that next year, the President will really have a reluctant Congress."

Close observers believe there is at least the possibility that the nation is moving into a vicious cycle in which Negroes riot because whites do not do enough and whites do not do enough because Negroes riot.

U.S. Voids Charges In Rights Death Case

V+2 9/28/66

By FRED P. GRAHAM

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Sept. 27—The Justice Department agreed today to the dismissal of Federal indictments against 17 white men accused of conspiracy in the murder of three civil rights workers two years ago in Neshoba County, Mississippi.

In a motion filed in Federal District Court in Jackson, Miss., John Doar, head of the department's Civil Rights Division, conceded that the indictments were defective and asked that they be dismissed.

Ironically, the indictments were found to be void because Negroes and women had not been fairly represented on the grand jury that indicted the men.

A Justice Department spokesman here said the Government was "obliged" to seek dismissal of the indictments.

U.S. VOIDS ITS CASE IN RIGHTS DEATHS

"This does not mean that the matter is closed," he said. "The case will be taken before a legally constituted grand jury as soon as possible."

The men were scheduled to have gone on trial in Jackson yesterday on charges of conspiring to violate the civil rights of the three dead men.

However, in arguments last Tuesday before United States District Judge W. Harold Cox, defense attorneys invoked the Rabinowitz case, a recent landmark decision of the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit. Under that ruling, grand juries must represent a fair cross-section of the community.

After the arguments were completed, Judge Cox postponed the trial pending a response by the Government.

Mr. Doar acknowledged in his memorandum today that the grand jurors who indicted the men in January, 1965, had been selected in a way that did not comply with the Appellate Court's decision.

About half of the prospective jurors' names were submitted by county officials who had been asked for the names of males registered to vote. Mr. Doar offered figures to show that few Negroes were registered to vote in Neshoba County prior to last year.

The rest of the names were recommended by so-called "key men" in the community who had been asked to suggest reliable prospective jurors. The Rabinowitz ruling specifically denounced this method as unconstitutional.

Agrees Case Is Void

Agreeing that the indictments are void unless the grand jury meets the Rabinowitz standard, Mr. Doar said:

"In a community composed of men and women and a large percentage of them Negroes, this standard can only be met if jury officials take steps reasonably needed to assure representation of both sexes and the members of the Negro race in the 'universe' from which jurors are obtained."

He concluded that Judge Cox "has no choice" but to dismiss the indictments to assure that "the case of every defendant will be considered by fair, impartial and intelligent grand and petit jurors."

It is the second time that Judge Cox has dismissed indictments against the men, making their case one of the most tangled in the recent series of Federal civil rights prosecutions.

Initially, 18 men were charged with violating an 1870 civil rights conspiracy law in connection with the murder of Michael H. Schwerner and Andrew Goodman of New York and James Earl Chaney of Meridian, Miss.

Jury Awaits Case Against Klansman In Liuzzo Slaying

HAYNEVILLE, Ala., Sept. 27 (AP)—A jury of eight Negroes and four whites heard state attorneys set out today to convict a Ku Klux Klansman of killing a white civil rights worker.

It was the fourth trial growing out of the slaying of Mrs. Viola Gregg Liuzzo, and the first in which Negroes were chosen for the jury.

The accused Klansman, Eugene Thomas, 43 years old, of Bessemer, Ala., a steel company employe, is charged with first-degree murder, which could bring the death penalty.

Attorney General Richmond M. Flowers directed the prosecution. His key witness was expected to be an undercover agent for The Federal Bureau of Investigation, Gary Thomas Rowe Jr. In the three earlier trials Mr. Rowe testified that he was in a speeding car from which the gunshot was fired that killed the Detroit housewife the night of March 25, 1965.

Mrs. Liuzzo, mother of five children, had taken part in the Selma-to-Montgomery civil rights march.

The first prosecution witnesses today were state and Federal officers who investigated the slaying. From their stories, the state sought to identify the bullet that hit Mrs. Liuzzo.

The bullet, found at the base of Mrs. Liuzzo's brain during an autopsy, was traced step by step through the officers who handled it until it reached the F.B.I. laboratory in Washington for ballistics tests.

There were 21 Negroes and 11 white men on the list of prospective jurors when the court reconvened today. The state struck seven and the defense 13.

Mr. Flowers got seven white men off the list, including one who had told the court earlier he was a former member of the Klan. Among the 13 Negroes stricken by the defense attorney, Arthur J. Hanes, was John Hulett, county chairman of the all-Negro Black Panther party.

The party running nine candidates for county office in the Nov. 8 general election.

Thomas is the second of three accused Klan members to be tried in state court in the killing. One other, Collie Leroy Wilkins, was acquitted here after his first trial ended with a deadlocked jury. The third, William Orville Eaton, died of a heart attack before he could be tried on a murder indictment.

However, all three defendants were convicted in Federal court on conspiracy charges growing out of the slaying and have appealed 10-year prison sentences.

THE NEW YORK TIMES, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER

'White Backlash' Becomes a Major Coast Issue

It Helps Reagan Even When He Doesn't Mention It, His Supporters Say

By LAWRENCE E. DAVIES

Special to The New York Times

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 27—The whole subject of open housing and "white backlash" has become a key issue, either stated or implied, as an increasingly bitter California campaign for the governorship enters its final six weeks.

"The backlash is a formidable problem," declared a leader in the re-election campaign of Gov. Edmund G. Brown, a two-term Democrat.

A spokesman for Ronald Reagan, the Republican nominee, said the former actor had a basic, residual issue in housing and in civil rights ramifications "even when he is not saying a damn word about it."

This means that strategists for both candidates recognize that many votes on Nov. 8 will hinge on the feelings of residents about the racial backgrounds of their neighbors, about the nondiscriminatory sale or rental of property, and about the Watts riots last year and racial violence elsewhere.

"White backlash," a resentment often not apparent before, is being detected by party workers among many white Californians.

An Issue for Both Parties

Both the Republican and Democratic state conventions grappled last month with the issue, whose implications Californians generally recognize when they hear the phrase "Rumford Fair Housing Act."

This law was, in effect, repealed in 1964 with a one-sided "yes" vote on proposition 14, which was then declared unconstitutional this year by the state Supreme Court. It covers most sales or rentals involving apartments with five or more units, forbidding discrimination on the basis of race, color, religion, ancestry or national origin. The matter is now on appeal to the United States Supreme Court.

Mr. Reagan is on record favoring repeal of the act. Fellow Republicans at the convention argued successfully for a platform plank calling for "repeal or amendment" and the act's "replacement or amendment by constructive legislation which protects the free choice and constitutional rights of all citizens."

The Governor originally supported the act vigorously, but has softened his position by proposing to appoint a bipartisan study commission to make recommendations to the next legislative session and "take this issue out of politics." The Democrats have followed up this approach with assurances to Californians that the Rumford Act does not take away an individual homeowner's "right to discriminate."

Reagan spokesmen say spot checks show that despite the Republican nominee's relative silence on the issue he is the beneficiary of a big vote originating in it and allied matters, including welfare payments to minority group members.

Reagan Retains Lead

Mr. Reagan is generally believed by influential persons in both parties to be still ahead of Mr. Brown, despite a marked loss of support indicated by straw polls since the primary election in June.

"We still have problems," a Brown campaign leader confessed "including the general mood of the state—frustration and dissatisfaction in the face of affluence. But we've got quite a head of steam and the polls have shown voters are deserting Reagan in droves."

A significant change has been noticeable in the Brown camp in the last two or three weeks. Whether justified or not, campaign workers have undergone a metamorphosis from despair to optimism. "The corner has been turned" is a common slogan, and the Governor has joined the chorus.

Mr. Reagan, on the other hand has been completely confident of victory all summer. He and his leading strategists huddled here last Friday to discuss the course of the campaign, especially in the light of urgings of "some sophisticated observers" that the nominee should go into much greater depth in discussing issues.

'Average Voter Satisfied'

"We concluded," a spokesman said, "that Reagan is communicating with people in great enough depth so that the average voter is satisfied."

Nor did the Brown managers this week predict any change in the Governor's campaign direction. His big campaign issue is what he calls Mr. Reagan's "inexperience" in government.

"Every index we have," a spokesman reported, "indicates this is the No. 1 cutting issue, but it's not a dramatic headline producer. If we identify Reagan with the Birchers it gets publicity. So we keep up the extremism issue."

The Brown campaigners contend that Mr. Reagan's "nearest thing to a positive proposal" so far is his promise, if elected, to appoint John A. McCone, former head of the Central Intelligence Agency to be chairman of a blue-ribbon commission to investigate the University of California at Berkeley.

Yorty's Votes Sought

Both parties have dissension. Both candidates are seeking the nearly one million Democratic votes that went to Mayor Samuel W. Yorty of Los Angeles, Mr. Brown's leading primary opponent.

Mr. Reagan's principal Republican rival, former Mayor George C. Christopher of San Francisco, and some other moderates are sitting on the sidelines. The sideliners so far also include Senator Thomas H. Kuchel who faces a re-election campaign in 1968.

Assembly Speaker Jesse M. Unruh, often at odds with the Governor but state chairman of his campaign this year, is described as performing whatever functions the Brown campaign leaders ask him to undertake.

Although canvasses made by Mervin Field of San Francisco and Don Mutchmore of Los Angeles, both long-time pollsters, showed late last month that Mr. Reagan was leading the Governor by three or four percentage points, instead of the 15 or 18 registered right after the primary, a Democratic source outside the Brown campaign hierarchy said spot checks in Southern California showed a greater spread.

Los Angeles Is Key

Mr. Brown's greatest strength lies in northern and central California, Mr. Reagan's in conservative counties such as Orange and San Diego. A key county is the state's biggest, Los Angeles.

Vice President Humphrey was there last night speaking for the Governor. Secretary of the Interior Stewart L. Udall was in the state last week with Mrs. Lyndon B. Johnson. President Johnson and other leading Democrats are expected later.

Mr. Reagan has said that he will not ask for outside help, that the election is between "the people of California and the candidates." Former Vice President Richard M. Nixon, who took on Mr. Brown unsuccessfully four years ago, is to speak in Oakland, but principally to raise funds for Congressional candidates.

this outbreak than for the Watts rioting in 1965.

The riot area near Candlestick Park quieted down late in the evening, but squads of Guardsmen, armed with rifles and bayonets, patroled the streets.

Then looting, burning and rock throwing burst out in Fillmore and authorities speeded about 1,000 troops, police and highway patrolmen into the area. Gangs of roving youths smashed windows and set fires in the streets before the area was sealed off.

"We cannot and will not tolerate any form of protest which endangers persons or damages property," the Gov-Brown declared.

Rioters had demanded that there be a confrontation in the poverty area. Four leaders met with Mayor John R. Shelley and Police Chief Thomas Cahill for about an hour before the peak of the trouble but left the Hall of Justice warning of a new outbreak.

ADULTS PLEAD

They were among youths who gathered earlier in the day at the Bayview Community Center. Adult leaders vainly tried to organize "Operation Freeze, Baby" to head off further violence but said later the "kids wouldn't buy it."

The corner was turned into a battlefield about 4:30 p.m. PST 7:30 p.m. EST as rioters attacked police and firemen.

A policeman was hit on the nose by a bottle and someone shouted, "A policeman has been shot." More officers massed two blocks away and marched to the center.

RIOTER FIRES

A half block away, a rioter ducked behind a parked car and fired a pistol shot at the officers. "All right, shoot," shouted an officer.

A volley of shots was directed at youths assembled in front of the center. At least three were hit in the legs by shotgun pellets while nearly a dozen were nicked with minor wounds. The officers stormed into the center and hauled out 30 to 40 youths.

Molotov cocktails splashed onto the street from rooftops and windows of houses. Police fired at the buildings with shotguns, rifles and pistols.

2 NEGROES FALL

At one point, a police officer slumped over in his squad car. Two Negroes were felled on the street during the crossfire.

A few minutes later, a white cloth was waved from a window. Officers stopped their fire as three persons, all wounded, emerged. They were hustled into a patrol car as more rioters surged to the corner.

At the Hall of Justice, San Francisco's weary police chief and mayor reached a decision earlier when the police radio crackled: "They're shooting at us. They've got rifles and guns and everything."

They conferred with Lt. Gen. Roderic Hill, state adjutant general, who earlier began moving guardsmen to temporary headquarters in Candlestick Park and Kezar Stadium. Orders were radioed to move the troops into Hunters Point and by 6:10 p.m. PST, 9:10 p.m. EST, a six-block area was cleared without resistance or gunfire.

Negro Violence Hits St. Louis

ST. LOUIS, Mo. (UPI)—Shouting bands of vandals roamed downtown streets Wednesday night, smashing windows, following a Congress of Racial Equality demonstration in protest to the slaying of a Negro robbery suspect.

About 50 persons dispersed at the end of the rally in front of police headquarters and smashed windows in stores and autos. A street sign was thrown through the windshield of one parked vehicle.

Police moved out in an effort to corral the demonstrators, who appeared for the fourth straight night.

The crowd was described as being "apparently leaderless" and consisted of teen-age Negroes.

As youths from the roving bands left the scene of the demonstration at police headquarters, some walked on the tops of parked autos and a street bench was hurled into the path of a bus.

Earlier Wednesday, a coroner's jury of four white man and two Negroes ruled the killing "justifiable homicide." A dozen angry demonstrators were kept from entering the building where the coroner's inquest was being held.

The 12 demonstrators carried signs reading "Police Murderers Must Go" and "A Scared Cop is a Dangerous Killer."

There were shouts of "Bring Finnegan out of there"—a reference to Patrolman William Finnegan who last Saturday shot and killed a handcuffed prisoner, Russell Hayes, 24, of East St. Louis, Ill. Police testified Hayes drew a weapon which later turned out to be a tear gas gun.

During the hearing, Louis Ford, a member of the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) walked angrily out of the room, saying "I'm sick of white people" and slamming the door behind him.

"I would like to see the policeman killed who killed the boy," he told a reporter.

Jonathon Harris, a member of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), was another angry observer. He said, "It's open season on Negroes in St. Louis. Negroes are treated like stray dogs . . . actually, dogs are treated better because they don't handcuff and kill them."

The hearing was recessed for one hour because of the commotion caused by a crowd of about 40 persons, roughly half of them believed to be CORE and NAACP members. Later, the jury of four white men and two Negroes took only 10 minutes to return a verdict that "Finnegan shot Hayes while performing his official police duties."

Negroes Riot Again In San Francisco

CONDITIONS

SAN FRANCISCO (UPI)—Mobs of roving Negro youths rioted Wednesday night, pelting police, firemen and National Guard riot troops with rocks, bricks and fire bombs.

Gov. Edmund G. Brown arrived in the city as guardsmen occupied two large Negro neighborhoods, Hunters Point, near Candlestick Park on the south end of the city, and the Fillmore district, five miles across town.

It was the second night of racial violence in a September heat wave that sent the temperature over 90. The rioting was touched off Tuesday when a white policeman shot and killed a Negro boy fleeing from a stolen automobile.

More than 20 persons were treated at one emergency hospital Wednesday night, nine for gunshot wounds. At least 20 were arrested.

Brown, interrupting his political campaign at San Diego, went immediately into conferences with city officials and National Guard officers.

"We will meet force with force," he said, adding that the state was better prepared for

Maddox Victory Confirms Toughening Of Resistance in Area to Negro Gains

By GENE ROBERTS

Special to The New York Times

ATLANTA, Sept. 29—The victory of Lester G. Maddox in the Democratic primary for Governor in Georgia yesterday makes it clear that the South is settling into a new and tougher period of resistance to Negro progress and the Administration of President Johnson. It all adds up to a major political upheaval, one that portends a period of political turmoil in the South at least as divisive—and perhaps more so—than the "Dixiecrat" rebellion of 1948.

News Analysis

Only eight to 10 months ago, white liberals were coming out of political retirement, convinced that the South had rounded the corner in race relations.

But in recent months almost all of them have been overwhelmed, not simply by segregatilonists, but by some of the most militant segregationists to have emerged in the South in this century.

In Alabama, Gov. George C. Wallace, the South's leading opponent of r.cial integration, ran his wife as a "stand in" candidate and rolled over nine opponents, all but one of them running as racial moderates or liberals, in the state's Democratic primary for Governor.

In Arkansas, Jim Johnson, a founder of the White Citizens Council in that state, won nomination over five opponents who soft-pedaled the race issue in the Democratic governorship primary.

In Maryland, George P. Mahoney, parwayed his opposition to housing desegregation into the Democratic gubernatorial nomination.

House Seat in Louisiana

In Louisiana, John R. Rarick, won the Democratic nomination for a seat in the United States House of Representatives, by labelling the incumbent, James H. Morrison, an "L.B.J. rubber stamp" and an ally of the "black power voting bloc."

The victory of Mr. Maddox, who once brandished a pistol and sold ax handles in an effort to halt restaurant desegregation simply confirms the trend.

All of this means that the South may be faced with a major third party movement.

Mr. Maddox and Mr. Johnson are Dixiecrats more than Democrats, and as unblushing admirers of Governor Wallace can be expected to campaign for him if he does the expected and runs for President as a third party candidate in 1968.

While Mr. Mahoney has not declared himself for or against Governor Wallace, many of his supporters are on the Wallace-for-President bandwagon and are almost certain to put pressure on Mr. Mahoney to bak the Alabama segregationist.

A few years ago this development might have delighted Republicans. But with strong candidates for governor in several states and with the hope of carrying the South into the Republican column in the 1968 Presidential campaign, they can take little comfort from it today.

A strong third-party campaign by Governor Wallace would wreck the Republican party's chances of carrying the South. And on the state level, Republicans have already been thrown into confusion by the recent primary developments.

Many Southern Republicans have been trying to build their party in the South by becoming more segregationist than the Democrats, who until this year appeared to be becoming more liberal.

Blow to the G.O.P.

But now the Republicans have little hope of convincing voters that they are more ardent in their segregation than Mr. Maddox, Mrs. Wallace, Mr. Johnson, Mr. Rarick and Mr. Mahoney. Thus, in a few brief strokes, they have been forced to look towards Negroes, white moderates and liberals as a main source of strength.

Liberals and Negroes, meanwhile, are gagging at the prospect of voting for such Republican segregationists and economic conservatives as Representative Howard R. Callaway, who is Mr. Maddox's opponent in Georgia, and Representative James Martin, who is opposing the Wallaces in Alabama. But already they are saying that they regard the Republicans as "the lesser of two evils."

To ensure that Negro liberals and moderates vote Republican, however, rather than stay home, Mr. Martin and Mr. Callaway may be forced to move more toward the position of Winthrop Rockefeller, the Republican candidate for Governor in Arkansa Mr. Rockefeller is conservative on fiscal matters but moderate on race.

But if liberals, Negroes and Republicans have their problems, so does the conservative Democratic establishment, whos members are often called "Bourbons."

Traditional segregationists such as Senator James O. Eastland of Mississippi and Senator Sam J. Irvin Jr. of North Carolina are part of the Bourbon establishment and have strong ties with Southern industrialists and planners.

Failure Rate Of Negroes Cited on Test

AC 10/2/66

(Copyright 1966 by the New York Times Co.)

WASHINGTON, Oct. 1 — More than two-thirds of all Negroes tested for induction into the armed forces over an 18-month period failed the armed forces qualification test, according to a publication of the Office of Education.

This figure, released after considerable reluctance by the Department of Defense, is contained in a survey of United States educational performance to be published in the October issue of "American Education."

According to the Defense Department breakdown, the rate of failure among Negroes was 67.5 per cent. Among non-Negroes, the rate was 18.8 per cent.

THE SURVEY, written up by Caryl Conner, editor of American Education and Prof. Richard Neufille of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, finds a close correlation between the quality of education available to Negroes in different parts of the country — measured by the amount of money spent, the pupil-teacher ratio and other factors — and the gap in performance between Negroes and whites.

The figures are taken from 383,000 tests administered by the armed forces between June 1964 and December 1965. They include both draftees and enlistees.

According to Mrs. Conner, the test is perhaps the most extensive survey of U. S. educational performance in existence.

The national failure figure for all races was 25.3 per cent. The highest failure rate for all races was 55.3 per cent in the District of Columbia. The lowest was in the State of Washington.

Sen. Clark Fears Bill May Be Lost

By JOSEPH A. LOFTUS

(Copyright 1966 by the New York Times Co.)

WASHINGTON — Sen. Joseph S. Clark, D-Pa., reported Wednesday after a fruitless Senate-House conference that "there may not be an anti-poverty bill." The senator is chairman of the joint conference.

The Senate and the House have passed bills authorizing anti-poverty funds of $1.75 billion for another year, but the bills differ in many respects. Conferees from both chambers agreed Tuesday on how to distribute the money among the many anti-poverty channels, but the negotiations deadlocked Wednesday on other conflicts in the two bills.

REAL DIFFERENCES

Some sources thought Clark was merely expressing a frustration of the moment. Nevertheless, the differences are real and they reflect some of the political undertones of the anti-poverty program.

In general, the House conferees seem to regard free-wheeling community action programs as political nusiances, if not threats. They propose to channel most of the community action money into specific programs, thereby limiting the discretion of anti-poverty Director Sargent Shriver. Some controls would add to the difficulties of Shriver's search for talent.

Another House provision that is causing trouble would require the director of the Office of Economic Opportunity—Shriver—to channel 20 per cent of the community action money into independent agencies. This is regarded on the Senate side as an attempt to weaken the community action agencies.

POWELL'S CURB

Another provision, personally sponsored by Rep. Adam Clayton Powell, D-N.Y., chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee, would not permit the use of federal funds to pay more than $12,500 a year to an official of a community action agency.

A related provision would not permit a community action agency to pay a salary that gave an official more than a 20 per cent raise over his last previous salary.

The proposed restriction on top talent in OEO itself—as distinguished from the local, community-run programs — would limit the number of officials getting salaries in the $20,000 to $25,000 range to 1 per cent of the total number of employes. The effect, according to OEO, would be the forced resignation of 24 top employes.

King Raps Negro Violence, Calls 'Burn' Advocates Dumb

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. (UPI)—Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. described Negro violence Wednesday night, saying most of the advocates of "burn baby burn" do not know how to strike a match.

King, whose Southern Christian Leadership Conference took a temperate stand on "black power" only a week ago, said Negroes should learn that rioting "only intensifies the fears of the white community."

King spoke at a meeting of appreciation for the Rev. Fred L. Shuttlesworth, a prominent figure in Birmingham integration struggles who later ran into civil rights trouble when he accepted a Cincinnati, Ohio, congregation.

"Most of those Negroes who talk about burning down cities don't even know how to strike a match," King told several hundred persons at the meeting.

King praised the accomplishments of his non-violent movement, which drew its first national attention here in 1963 during daily demonstrations and pointed to desegregation of accommodations and public schools as the result.

He also took a few verbal pokes at Gov. George C. Wallace and Lester Maddox, the Georgia Democratic gubernatorial nominee.

RAPS MADDOX

"There is something wrong with the State of Georgia that has an ax-handle, pistol-carrying sick child of God as the Democratic standard bearer," he said.

"There is something wrong with the state of Alabama which has a Wallace and a Sister Wallace," he added.

"I am against riots with all my heart because they only intensify the fear of the white community," he said.

King also called for better working conditions for Negroes as well as better housing. He said Negroes should be hired first and then trained for the job.

CITES ABORTIONS

The Negro leader mentioned illegitimacy and admitted that Negroes are in the majority of illegitimate births in America.

"But at the same time there are two million abortions each year and 98 per cent of them are white," he said. "I don't know if it isn't better morally to go ahead and have the child."

King said he had been "talking about some hard facts tonight" and branched out into the war on poverty, saying money being used to aid the fight in Viet Nam should be used to help Negroes in the United States.

"Most Negroes don't have wall-to-wall carpets; they have wall-to-wall rats and roaches," he said.

RUSTIN DEPLORES FAITH IN VIOLENCE

He Fears 'Tragedy' Unless People Act Politically

By ROBERT E. DALLOS

A civil rights leader said yesterday that American Negroes believe they cannot gain their rights without resorting to violence.

"We are in a society where young people — particularly young Negroes—are being systematically taught that unless they resort to violence there is no future for them," Bayard Rustin, executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, said.

He made his remarks at the annual winter meeting of the United States Youth Council at the Carnegie Building, 345 East 46th Street.

The council represents more than 36 national religious, service and political organizations.

Mr. Rustin, who was a principal organizer of the 1963 March on Washington by civil rights proponents, cited a number of examples to back his argument.

In Chicago, he said, a group of Negroes had "walked" for a year in an effort to get Negroes assigned to a fire company in a Negro area.

Demand Is Met

"They worked very hard," he said. "They went to the Mayor and the City Council and to everyone. Finally, one spring afternoon a group of young Negroes tore up the fire company, broke all the windows, and in 24 hours there was an agreement that three new Negro firemen would be assigned to that area."

He said such results had the effect of "automatically teaching these youngsters that what the Negro established leadership could not do by negotiation, by arbitration and in other manners, they were able to accomplish by violence in a short time."

He called for "political action" by Negroes and whites working for civil rights in order to avoid riots.

"We have simply got to get people in action politically," he said. "We have got to do the educotion job that is required. Unless we do that we are faced with nothing but tragedy."

He said the Negroes in this country have "been through the period of agitation, have been through the period of legal action and we are now faced with a very serious political task requiring total dedication."

He predicted that the civil rights movement could not look for much help from the 90th Congress.

'Freedom Budget' Urged

Nevertheless he said it was urgent for Congress to accept the recently proposed "Freedom Budget."

This $185-billion plan was offered in October by a group of civil rights, religious and labor leaders and was designed to end poverty in the United States within 10 years.

This would be done, according to the plan, by means of a guaranteed annual income, increased Social Security and welfare benefits, full employment, a rise in farm incomes and health, housing and educational opportunities for all persons.

"Negroes only want a piece of the existing pie," he said. "They are not revolutionaries. What is revolutionary is that they cannot even get a piece of the existing pie unless there is a fundamental change—economic and social—in this society.

"This society cannot deliver what is the Negro's constitutional right unless it is prepared to dig deep into its social order and change things."

Moderate View Is Dim, Extremists Rule Roost

By EUGENE PATTERSON

SYLVAN MEYER, the editor of The Daily Times in Gainesville, has written a pithy account of Georgia's political tangle for the Dec. 12 issue of the national magazine The Nation. Only at the ending does he permit himself an editorial analysis.

"HOW DID GEORGIA, not quite so pure in heart yet not quite so backward as either its boosters or detractors contend, wind up with the miserable choice between Maddox and Callaway?" Meyer asks. And his answer stings.

"Happenstances of politics aside, it is possible that the effect is being felt from years of unrefuted yammering about alleged federal encroachment on states' rights, loss of liberty, yielding of 'freedom' (to prevent other people from having some) and similar mindlessness.

Eugene Patterson is editor of The Atlanta Constitution.

"IT MUST BE faced that the moderate, constructive people in this country have done a poor job of getting their point of view across.

"Few have been heard defending the policies that over the past few years have increased prosperity, personal income, educational opportunities and individual rights.

"So the people, made nervous and unsure by negativism, have decided to change. What they think they are changing from has been ineptly defined by its champions; what they are changing to hasn't been defined at all."

MAYBE THEY just got worn down by the ceaseless din of negativism, hunkered down under the beating and turned defensive. It would be easy to blame Lyndon B. Johnson for this failure to communicate the worth of progressive government, and for the consequent focusing of dislike against him and it. But that's too easy. President John F. Kennedy could communicate like nobody's business. And he was disliked as much or more than Johnson in the South.

The fact of the matter is that "increased prosperity, personal income, educational opportunities and individual rights" are gains that won't get through the sound barrier to the race-deafened ear of the Southern majority until there is a greater change of racial attitudes than presently obtains. Until then, any definition of progressive government that includes civil rights will be inept for the simple reason that experience shows it won't be listened to.

THE NEGATIVISM gowing out of this blind spot distorts the true achievements of the nation hurtfully. Little credit is given to a system of government that has wrought wonders. across the face of the earth, U.S. governments that have created a whole new history of justice, peace and plenty have been bitterly doubted and assailed at home by a generation of pessimists.

The massive number of houses and hospitals and schools and factories that intelligent U.S. aid programs have encouraged Latin American countries to build through self-help astonishes the U.S. traveler and fills him with pride. But he comes home to hear the tired old "giveaway" speeches in Congress, detached from reality yet unstayed by the weary protests that the nation's policies are far better than the people know.

VIET NAM strikes the visitor as one of the most selfless and idealistic undertakings this rich nation has ever shouldered. Yet the home front is alight with flares of suspicion and acrimony that blind the people to a clear view even of what it is their government is trying to do.

Meyer is right. The years of "unrefuted yammering" take effect. Unfortunately, the gap between the greatness of what we are as a nation, and the little we credit ourselves as being, may lead to an erosion of what we are.

Close-Up

'Wonderful World of Ill Will'

"If ever a nation was debauched by a man, the American nation has been debauched by Johnson. . . . If ever a nation has suffered under improper influence of a man, the American nation has suffered from the influence of Johnson.

"I shudder at the calamities which I fear his conduct is preparing for this country: from a mean thirst of popularity, an inordinate ambition, and a want of sincerity."

Sounds like a James Gray or a Garland Byrd campaign speech, doesn't it?

Well, just take the name of Johnson out of where it appears in the first paragraph and insert Washington in its place and you'll have an exact quote from a contemporary foe of our first president.

The second paragraph is a direct quote from our second president, John Adams, commenting on his successor, Thomas Jefferson.

This is not to compare Lyndon with George or Tom, but rather to compare politics today with politics over a century and a half ago.

The quotations used are contained in a handy "Hater's Handbook" written by Joseph Rosner and described on its jacket as "A Guide to the Wonderful World of Ill Will: the catcalls, abuse and caustic comment flung at persons of note throughout the ages."

As we enjoy the first lull today in what promises to be as knock-down-drag-out a campaign as any in Georgia history, it might be well to go back a while with Mr. Rosner.

When James Buchanan was leaving the White House, he said to his successor:

"If you are as happy, my dear sir, on entering this house as I am in leaving it and returning home, you are the happiest man in this country."

Abraham Lincoln was quick to learn what Buchanan meant. In the four years and one month Lincoln occupied that house his enemies leveled these charges against him: He was illegitimate; his wife, Mary Todd Lincoln, was a Confederate spy; and his son made half a million dollars on government contracts.

Many years later, Woodrow Wilson was described by William Roscoe Thayer, poet and historian, as "a despot of unlimited reach" who had done "more to denature and destroy democracy in the United States than all our enemies have been able to do since our government was founded in 1789."

Quite recently John Birch Society founder Robert Welch expressed the "firm belief that Dwight Eisenhower is a dedicated, conscious agent of the Communist conspiracy. . . ."

But all this is on the somewhat lofty plane of presidential politics. When we get down on the lower political level, Mr. Rosner recalls that Louisiana's colorful Huey Long once said of a critic: "When I call him an s.o.b. I am not using profanity, but am referring to the circumstances of his birth."

From there we climb to the height of something or other in the campaign between George Smathers and incumbent Claude Pepper for one of Florida's seats in the U.S. Senate about 18 years ago. For audiences in the rural areas, Smathers reportedly was saying something like this:

"Are you aware that Claude Pepper is known all over Washington as a shameless extravert? Not only that, but this man had to matriculate before he could go to college, and he has a sister who was once a Thespian in wicked New York. But worst of all, it is an established fact that Mr. Pepper, before his marriage, practiced celibacy."

Be sure you vote today for the candidate of your choice.—JIM RANKIN.

TRAINING LEADERS In a series of Leadership Training Workshops, CORE SEDF is bringing to civil rights leaders knowledge of law, of government agencies and how they work, of the economics of equality, and of methods of community organization. There is tremendous eagerness for this knowledge, and agreement that if the movement for Negro rights is to build strength, its leaders all over the country must increase their know-how.

At our first Workshop in Mississippi in January 37 men and women, young and old, farmers, teachers, and housewives, heard Charles Morgan, Jr., Southern Director of the American Civil Liberties Union, on The Constitution as a Source of Strength. Howard Glickstein, counsel for the U. S. Commission on Civil Rights and Charles Duncan, general counsel of the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission, explored recently passed civil rights legislation. The participants learned how to use Titles VI and VII of the 1964 act, studied the Presidential Executive Orders, and learned about the roles of the Justice Department, the Civil Rights Commission and the Department of Agriculture. Other government officials and experienced civil rights lawyers, serving as faculty without fee, spoke and led discussions.

The Rev. Ronnie Moore, who has directed the Louisiana program of CORE for the past four years, is organizing the Workshops which consist of a series of four sessions in each locale. They are held on weekends so as not to interfere with jobs. The faculty goes to the students. And what the students learn, they take back to their communities for immediate application. An imposing group of skilled resource people in education, law, government and community organization have agreed to teach at the three remaining Mississippi Workshops, and at others planned for South Carolina, California and Baltimore.

Though the cost of a single Workshop is low--only $1,600--(a series of four costs about $6,500)--CORE SEDF now has almost no money for the expansion of this seminal program. A grant of $4,000 from the Norman Fund and of $2,500 from the Ottinger Foundation enabled the start. But we don't know how we can meet the demand for more Workshops, especially in the North and West. $46,000 is still needed to meet these calls for the first year.

SCHOLARSHIPS When high-school youngsters who never considered college become active in civil rights, personal capacities develop, sights are raised, ambitions form. College becomes a goal. Such youngsters are among the 18 receiving CORE SEDF college and university scholarships for the first time for the 1966 Spring semester. Others among new recipients required help when, after taking part in actions, their fathers and mothers lost their jobs. Altogether, now 62 students, South and North, are receiving essential financial assistance at an annual cost of $55,000. Joe Louis Smith of CORE is in his first year of diplomatic studies at The Fletcher School; Earl Harris of SNCC is in his last year of law at the University of Pittsburgh. Recipients have been active in the full range of civil rights groups.

WASHINGTON Though the December White House Conference, To Fulfill These Rights, was widely criticized, valuable discussion took place. SEDF has reprinted copies of Panel Discussions on the Family, Administration of Justice Preliminary Report, and Voting and Citizenship Participation Preliminary Report, which are available upon request.

NEW VOTERS During 1965, 32,488 Negroes were registered in CORE SEDF's highly successful voter-registration campaign in 24 South Carolina counties. SEDF legal action has supported and protected registrants. At James McCain's and local leaders' insistence, federal registrars have come into two counties with excellent results. Next, transportation is needed to bring Negroes in rural places to the county seats. Already in some counties Negro registrants outnumber white and the election of Negroes to local, county and state office is anticipated in 1966. Community organization is beginning in the precincts. Jim McCain says, "To give a community the kind of guidance and help it needs one must work day and night with the community." The staff of five is doing just that.

Fresh new legal concepts are absolutely necessary now if Negro rights are to become actual practice. CORE SEDF lawyers are testing concepts in a series of actions at the same time they defend local Negroes from scores of harassing actions by southern officials.

School Suits In an action against the New York City Board of Education, before the United States District Court for the southern district of New York, our chief counsel, Carl Rachlin, charges that the Board has deliberately perpetuated inequality in city schools by knowinglyand habitually assigning inferior teachers to Negro schools. The complaint, based on an exhaustive study newly completed by the Russell Sage Foundation, points to lack of qualified teachers producing poor schools in urban Negro areas in the North. The suit asks that the Board of Education be ordered by injunction to alter its policies of teacher assignment.

In four Southern cases, injunctions were obtained by SEDF ordering school boards to submit integration plans in 80 days. But the forthcoming plans, accepted by the courts, are not acceptable to CORE SEDF. We are appealing on the ground that their pupil placement and area-assignment proposals are in truth masked devices for maintaining segregation. If the courts find for SEDF, important precedents will be established to help those fighting the appalling slowness of school integration everywhere in the nation.

Public Buildings The civil liberty to challenge the illegal orders of police and other officials is at issue in two suits, one recently argued before the United States Supreme Court, by Carl Rachlin and Murphy Bell of Baton Rouge, Louisiana, the other now before the New Jersey Supreme Court. In the first, CORE members entering the white public library in Clinton, and requesting books--were ordered out by a policeman and later convicted of disturbing the peace. If you refuse an order to leave a public building where you have a legal right to be, and if your bearing is quiet, can you be convicted of disturbing the peace?

In the second case a Negro making a controversial point about urban renewal was ordered out of a Trenton City Council meeting, and after refusing, was later convicted of disturbing a meeting. These cases bear closely on the continued exclusion of Negroes from many public buildings and public events in the United States.

Reopening Facilities Often now in the South, complete closing of public facilities for whites and Negroes follows the read-in, swim-in, or other demonstration. In Clinton, Louisiana, all public libraries remain closed; in Tallahassee, Florida, all public swimming pools are closed. An effect is to intimidate Negroes not to integrate facilities open to them by law. In both places, our lawyers press for reopening the facilities to everyone; favorable decisions will be of important general use in the South.

In Klan-dominated Bogalusa SEDF lawyers obtained an injunction in July ordering police to protect peeceful demonstrators. The injunction was flagrantly violated by Bogalusa police. Police officials were found guilty of contempt and ordered to cease. Subsequently, the police went on a rampage and brutally violated the court order. SEDF asked for a more effective order and Judge Christenberry is now preparing his opinion.

Job Campaign In Syracuse, New York, SEDF has provided legal advice and encouragement to the campaign for more Negro jobs at the Niagara Mohawk Power Company. Twenty-four Negroes have been added to the payroll and absurdly high minimal job qualifications that are in effect very discriminatory are under legal attack.

Sheriff A Georgia sheriff, with the help of a Florida sheriff, recently removed a Negro from Florida to Georgia where he was wanted on a manslaughter charge. The sheriff got a warrant for his arrest after jailing him. CORE SEDF is filing a suit to stop illegal abduction of Negroes across state lines.

Prisons A suit attacking prison segregation laws and charging Gadsden County, Florida officials with a conspiracy to deny equal protection to a Negro has been filed by SEDF attorney John Due in U. S. District Court. Florida law provides for the segregation of prisoners according to race and Due contends, "It's unconstitutional on its face." The SEDF suit asks for: (1) A Federal writ of habeas corpus to free a son of the president of the Havana Chapter of the NAACP serving a 60-day sentence in a segregated prison and (2) A Federal injunction to restrain Florida officials from operating segregated prisons and institutions.

ART SHOW The 1965 exhibition and sale raised almost $60,000 making possible our vital legal program. Another successful event is indicated for the 1966 show at the Grippi and Waddell Gallery from April 28 to May 8. Mr. Philip Guston and Mr. Lloyd Goodrich will chair the Art Committee. Mrs. August Heckscher and Mrs. John Lindsay are honorary chairmen, Mrs. Shelley Appleton and Mrs. Arthur Logan, patron chairmen. This year CORE SEDF will require more than $90,000 for legal defense.

Dear Paul:

As you know, the CORE Scholarship, Education and Defense Fund has carried on a program of scholarship assistance to students who have shown outstanding leadership in the field of civil rights. These students have been active in every branch of the civil rights movement, and we are proud that this has been so.

Enclosed are five copies each of the revised application form and the current critieria sheet. I hope you will be able to distribute this to local groups of the Council. We will be happy to provide additional forms as you require.

You will note that the deadline for applications for the fall semester is May 1.

Thanks so much for your interest and concern.

Sincerely,

Marvin Rich

ELEANOR ROOSEVELT SCHOLARSHIP PROGRAM

GENERAL INFORMATION

CORE Scholarship, Education and Defense Fund, Inc. established its Eleanor Roosevelt scholarship program in 1962 to aid deserving students without financial means to obtain a college education.

Students of all races and from all parts of the country are eligible to apply. Preference is given to students who have been actively involved in efforts to eliminate racial prejudice and discrimination and to secure legal rights for persons of all races. Special consideration is given to those who have made significant contributions and sacrifices in their work for human rights.

PURPOSE AND AMOUNT OF GRANTS

1. Scholarships awarded to students who have been admitted to a college accredited by a regional accrediting body.

2. Grants are made to cover tuition and/or living expenses.

3. Depending on need, scholarships are granted in any amount up to $1,500 for one academic year. In exceptional cases, a supplementary grant of up to $500 may be made.

4. Scholarships may be renewed for subsequent years upon application. CORE SEDF will endeavor to continue support of students selected for grants, but cannot guarantee to do so.

CRITERIA FOR SELECTION

1. Evidence of financial need.

2. Record of activity in efforts to eliminate racial prejudice and segregation and to obtain legal rights for all citizens.

3. Evidence of good character and leadership potential.

4. Evidence of academic ability sufficient to benefit from higher education.

APPLICATION PROCEDURE

1. To apply, students must submit:

   a- Completed application form (obtainable from CORE SEDF).

   b- References from at least two persons of known leadership or staff position in the civil rights field.

   c- Copy of high school or college transcript.

2. Deadlines

   a- Applications for FALL semester must be filed by May 1st.

   b- Applications for SPRING semester must be filed by November 1st.

CORE

SEDF

The CORE Scholarship, Education and Defense Fund was established in 1963 to provide a number of basic, and previously neglected, services to the civil rights movement. Chief among these is making educational opportunities available to young people who have demonstrated exceptional character, a capacity for community leadership and a serious commitment to the civil rights movement. In addition, CORE SEDF has accepted major responsibilities in voter registration education and in furnishing legal counsel where it is needed most urgently – in the often remote places where small groups of civil rights workers wage their lonely struggle.

Contributions to CORE SEDF are tax deductible. This folder describes the full range of its activities.

PROGRAMS

of the

CORE Scholarship, Education and Defense Fund

ELEANOR ROOSEVELT SCHOLARSHIPS

Scholarship grants of up to $1,500 per year are awarded to young leaders and potential leaders, regardless of race, whose need for assistance arises from, or is related to, their participation in the civil rights movement. Some of our twenty-eight present recipients (six are in law schools) were expelled from public institutions near their homes because they dared to take democracy seriously. Some, white as well as Negro, require financial aid to integrate previously segregated institutions. Some, as a result of their civil rights work experience, have raised their educational sights beyond their financial capacity. All recognize the importance of higher education to themselves and to the movement to which they have dedicated themselves.

Eleanor Roosevelt Scholars must be persons of proven capability and integrity and must be accepted by an accredited college or graduate school. An important and unique feature of these scholarships is that they give a chance not only to brilliant scholars, whom so many are eager to aid, but to students of average, or even less than average academic standing, who have demonstrated exceptional character and leadership capacity.

Because Eleanor Roosevelt Scholars must meet exacting standards, this program could not be expanded without limit. The need, however, greatly exceeds our present financial resources.

LEGAL DEFENSE AND SERVICE

Test cases in the U. S. Supreme Court make headlines and history. But the most critical unmet need of the civil rights movement today is for lawyers at the scene of action. Legal advice before action takes place can often avert disastrous consequences and make the action more effective. Local citizens and civil rights workers often languish in filthy, crowded and brutal jails for weeks, and even months, regardless of established law and Supreme Court precedents, because no lawyers are available to take their cases.

CORE Scholarship, Education and Defense Fund now has eight lawyers on salary or retainer in Louisiana, Mississippi, northern Florida and North Carolina. A ninth works in New York City coordinating the efforts of many volunteer attorneys. A number of other lawyers cooperate by traveling to the South to handle civil rights matters for SEDF on a case-by-case basis.

The need for on-the-spot legal services is immense and is not abating. SEDF has only been able to make a beginning on this crucial program.

VOTER EDUCATION AND REGISTRATION

Events in Alabama have focused the attention of the nation on the importance and problems of registering southern Negro voters. SEDF gained considerable experience in this area last year in successful registration campaigns in Louisiana, north Florida and California. Currently, SEDF is sponsoring a Citizenship Education Project in South Carolina. Another program is under way in north Florida, and plans are being completed for voter education programs in other southern states.

Voter projects often produce important side benefits. For example, in north Florida previously unknown community leaders emerged during the drive, community participation and spirit developed, and groups organized for voter registration moved effectively to cope with other community problems and needs.

CHANEY-GOODMAN-SCHWERNER MEMORIAL COMMUNITY CENTER

In Meridian, Mississippi, a community center will be built to honor and carry on the work of James Chaney, Andrew Goodman, and Michael Schwerner, the young men who were murdered in June, 1964. CORE SEDF is sponsoring the building and financing of this center. Jackie Robinson and Ralph Samuels head the fund-raising committee.

Before Michael Schwerner's death, he and his wife struggled to maintain a center in Meridian with few resources. The new center will provide meeting and class rooms, a library, space for recreation, health services, vocational training and remedial education – facilities never before available to Negroes in Mississippi. This center will be the first of many planned to meet the growing demand for them in underdeveloped areas of our South.

COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT FELLOWSHIPS

The past few summers, and particularly the summer of 1964, demonstrated the value of field work in southern Negro communities by qualified and dedicated college and university students. SEDF has now inaugurated a program of fellowships for carefully selected students in education, agriculture, economics, political science, sociology, religion, public health, and other relevant areas of study, to enable them to broaden their understanding of their subjects by using their skills where they are needed most. Recipients of SEDF fellowship grants will work with national and local civil rights organizations. Emphasis will be on using these students to stimulate and train local leadership, so that projects initiated during the summer will be continued throughout the year.

LEADERSHIP DEVELOPMENT INSTITUTE

SEDF's board of directors has given this program top priority for the coming year. Planning is in process for a continuing school with courses in community organization, group leadership, techniques of action and administration, and relevant aspects of economics, political science, history, social psychology, and civil, administrative, and criminal law. The institute probably will be established in the New York City area, with the hope that SEDF or other groups will be able to use it as a model for similar institutes elsewhere.

The young leaders and potential leaders constantly emerging in the civil rights movement and related community groups urgently need this kind of training. Experience is the only real teacher, but experience without preparation teaches little more than frustration.

Students in the leadership development institute will be outstanding young people already involved in civil rights and community action. Their studies will relate directly to their work, not remove them from it. The faculty will be made up of persons with solid qualifications in their subjects, teaching in the institute on a part-time but more or less permanent basis. Tentative planning is for three or four-month sessions. The budget has not yet been fixed, but it will provide for a minimal administrative staff salaries sufficient to ensure that the best possible instructors are attracted and made to feel that their best efforts are demanded, necessary books and materials, and rent in case suitable quarters are not available free.

OTHER PROGRAMS

These include a highly successful agricultural field-education worker project in Mississippi, transferred to National Sharecroppers Fund March 1, 1965.

ADMINISTRATION

SEDF is proud that it has been able to manage substantial funds and vital programs with a very low overhead. The Fund utilizes a number of skilled volunteers, including its own board members, and avoids costly fund-raising and operating methods.

Its Executive Director is Marvin Rich who helped to found the St. Louis Congress of Racial Equality in 1948, while a student at Washington University. He joined the staff of National CORE in 1959, after playing an important role in activating the St. Louis labor movement in behalf of civil rights and planning the desegregation of the St. Louis public schools. After nearly six years as one of the key leaders of CORE, operating recently under the title of Community Relations Director, he brings to SEDF knowledge of and experience in all aspects of the civil rights field, as well as administrative ability.

Contributions to CORE Scholarship, Education, and Defense Fund are tax deductible. Your help is needed.

Antipoverty Agency Lists 9 Head Start Conditions

(MISSISSIPPI)

By JOSEPH A. LOFTUS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13 — The Office of Economic Opportunity has listed nine conditions that must be met before the Child Development Group of Mississippi can receive new Head Start funds.

These conditions include genuine efforts to bring poor white children into the program, satisfaction of disallowances resulting from an audit of the previous grant and new leadership.

Jule M. Sugarman, associate director of Project Head Start, the prekindergarden program for poor children, listed the conditions in a letter to the Rev. Bryant George of the Board of Missions of the United Presbyterian Church in New York.

The Board of Missions supports the Mary Holmes Junior College at West Point, Miss., which is the nominal sponsor of the Child Development Group's Head Start project.

Sargent Shriver, director of the antipoverty office, announced at the end of September that he had rejected the group's application for another grant.

The decision led to protests by clerics and liberal leaders. They accused Mr. Shriver of having terminated a successful project for poor children under pressure of the Democratic organization of Mississippi.

"A thin mask for a politically dictated decision," a committee of the Citizens' Crusade Against Poverty, a private organization, said.

Lawyers, educators and students scheduled meetings today and tomorrow at Howard University Law School here to decide on a course of action.

One antipoverty agency complaint against the group was that, contrary to other social patterns in Mississippi, the Negroes excluded whites. The project leaders replied that whites not only had chosen to exclude themselves but also had set fire to two of their centers.

The agency also said an interim audit had not accounted satisfactorily for $654,000. The project received $5.6-million last February for a six-month period and requested $20.5-million for 12 months. It served 1,200 children in 28 scattered counties.

The Sugarman letter said a maximum of $5-million of unobligated funds was available for Mississippi Head Start projects in view of commitments

Civil Rights Leaders Draw Up Bill to Protect Their People in South

COURTS

Introduction of Plan Set Today; Jury Integration Big Goal; Racial Incidents Seen Likely

By KENNETH G. SLOCUM
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

ATLANTA — Civil rights leaders will open a new drive today to gain protection and fair treatment for Negroes and civil rights workers in the South. They predict that before the drive is over it probably will be dramatized by new racial incidents.

The goal is passage of the Civil Rights Protection Act of 1966, a joint product of several rights groups that has already been dubbed the Southern Justice Bill. The proposed legislation is expected to be introduced in the Senate today. It is generally expected that some version of the bill, or of a less ambitious one likely to be submitted by the Justice Department in a few weeks, will be enacted this year.

"This is a law designed to take out of the civil rights movement deep, unending fear, the thing that has prevented most other civil rights laws from being effective," declares Charles Morgan, Southern regional head of the American Civil Liberties Union.

Some Tough Requirements

The bill, being circulated privately here, doesn't contain any major provisions not already advocated by rights groups, but it does contain broad and surprisingly tough requirements intended to force sharp changes in the present operation of the Southern judicial system.

Its major provisions: Integration of Southern juries; Federal assumption of many state and local proceedings against Southerners accused of crimes against Negroes and civil rights workers; extension of fair employment requirements to state and local governments, especially police forces; and, probably most important to rights people, Federal protection for Negroes exercising their Constitutional rights—such as voting or using integrated facilities—and for rights workers assisting the Negroes.

The introduction of the bill is coming only a few months after the broad voting rights bill went into effect, and if the new bill passes it will be the third major rights bill enacted in as many years. But the bill is sorely needed, assert civil rights leaders who stoutly reject the contentions of some critics that adequate Federal legislation now is in force.

ATLANTA — Civil rights leaders will open a new drive today to gain protection and fair treatment for Negroes and civil rights workers in the South. They predict that before the drive is over it probably will be dramatized by new racial incidents.

The goal is passage of the Civil Rights Protection Act of 1966, a joint product of several rights groups that has already been dubbed the Southern Justice Bill. The proposed legislation is expected to be introduced in the Senate today. It is generally expected that some version of the bill, or of a less ambitious one likely to be submitted by the Justice Department in a few weeks, will be enacted this year.

"This is a law designed to take out of the civil rights movement deep, unending fear, the thing that has prevented most other civil rights laws from being effective," declares Charles Morgan, Southern regional head of the American Civil Liberties Union.

Some Tough Requirements

The bill, being circulated privately here, doesn't contain any major provisions not already advocated by rights groups, but it does contain broad and surprisingly tough requirements intended to force sharp changes in the present operation of the Southern judicial system.

Its major provisions: Integration of Southern juries; Federal assumption of many state and local proceedings against Southerners accused of crimes against Negroes and civil rights workers; extension of fair employment requirements to state and local governments, especially police forces; and, probably most important to rights people, Federal protection for Negroes exercising their Constitutional rights—such as voting or using integrated facilities—and for rights workers assisting the Negroes.

The introduction of the bill is coming only a few months after the broad voting rights bill went into effect, and if the new bill passes it will be the third major rights bill enacted in as many years. But the bill is sorely needed, assert civil rights leaders who stoutly reject the contentions of some critics that adequate Federal legislation now is in force.

"In much of the South, rural areas particularly, most of the civil rights legislation passed in the last four years is completely ineffective," contends Andrew Young, a top aide in Martin Luther King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference. He adds: "Negroes legally can use public accommodations or vote, but many don't for fear of physical reprisal by whites. These Negroes know, as well as their tormentors, that any white man who takes the law into his own hands is almost assured he will be set free."

Rights leaders say that nearly 40 Negroes and white civil rights workers have been killed in rights violence in the past five years, including 17 last year, but that less than half a dozen sentences—none for more than 10 years—have resulted.

Intimidation and Abuse

The new bill also is needed, these leaders contend, because of what they call daily intimidation and abuse of Negroes by segregationists who, it is claimed, know they won't be punished by local Southern courts.

The rights people bring up the case of James Jackson, who with a friend recently entered a St. Augustine, Fla., cafe usually patronized by whites only. According to the civil rights officials, a white man began harassing the two Negroes and finally threw hot coffee on one. The white man insisted it was an accident. At any rate, a scuffle ensued and as a result Mr. Jackson was sentenced to jail for four months while the white man went free, the civil rights leaders say.

Incidents such as this, however, may be minor compared with troubles that could crop up as the bill is debated. Civil rights leaders say they plan to wait to see how Congress handles the bill before implementing a campaign to aid passage, but they aren't ruling out the type of demonstrations and headline catching marches that some thought were a big factor in the prompt passage of the 1965 voting rights bill.

In fact, John Lewis, chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, speculates that major demonstrations may be called for before a bill is passed.

"We suspect before it's over it will take new Selmas to dramatize this bill and get it through Congress," adds John Barber, executive assistant to Mr. King. "Just as Jim Clark

(the sheriff in Selma, Ala.) co-authored the voting rights bill of 1965 and Bull Connor (Eugene Connor, the police commissioner of Birmingham during incidents there in 1964) helped write the civil rights bill of 1964, there undoubtedly will be somebody who will personify the forces of evil in this," he says.

The officials of the groups that helped write the current bill figure the provision providing for integration of Southern juries stands the best chance of passing relatively intact. These juries, critics agree, usually are all-white. (And they're usually all-male juries. Alabama, South Carolina and Mississippi currently exclude women from state juries, although this is being challenged in courts.)

The bill doesn't tell states or counties they must select juries in a certain way, a feature expected to lessen the opposition of groups fearing loss of states' rights. Basically, it would provide a model jury system in Federal district courts, ensuring that juries would be picked through random sampling systems that would provide diverse race and economic representation. Literacy tests would be stricken for normal requirements of Federal juries.

This system would then be used as the key in selecting state and local juries should the Federal Government be called in to supervise such selection. And the Government could be called in to do this upon complaints—from local citizens, litigants or the U.S. Attorney General—that Negroes were being systematically excluded from juries because of their race. This is similar to the bringing in of Federal registrars to supervise voting under the 1965 law.

Among other things, a bipartisan Federal Jury Commission, which would administer the system, could order a local court to utilize Federal jury lists and procedures.

Assuming Jurisdiction

Even tougher is another major provision allowing Federal district courts to step in and assume jurisdiction in state cases where it is necessary to assure "fair protection" of the law. Specifically included would be trials for crimes against Negroes and civil rights workers in cases where Negroes were systematically excluded from juries. In essence, in most recent civil rights killings, such as that of Mrs. Viola Liuzzo in Alabama, last year, a Federal court could prosecute a murder case under the state law, one expert on the bill maintains.

The Federal court could also handle cases involving crimes against Negroes and civil rights workers under a variety of other conditions. These would include situations where it is shown that the judge was elected in segregated elections or that the local jails and police forces practiced segregated employment.

Similarly, Negroes and civil rights workers being tried for crimes could ask for a trial in Federal court if it were shown, for instance, that Negroes were systematically excluded from juries or that discrimination existed in local police department employment or the election of judicial officials.

Protection of Workers

One widely sought aim in the civil rights movement, legislation to protect civil rights workers, is also included. The provision would make it a Federal crime to intimidate or injure Negroes because they are exercising their Constitutional rights, or civil rights workers assisting them. Penalties would range up to 20 years in prison and a $10,000 fine in case of death or grave bodily injury. Currently, murder is not a Federal crime.

Also written into the new bill is an unusual clause to utilize cash awards to help out a victim of civil rights violence or his relatives. Complaints of injuries would be investigated, in some cases by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, under order of the present U.S. Commission on Civil Rights. Payments would be decided upon before a new civil rights indemnification board, to be appointed by the President. While initial payment of the unspecified sums to the victims would be by Uncle Sam, the Federal Government could bring suit against parties and the state, county or town involved to recover the amount. For instance, the Government would sue a state for the damages if it thought the state was responsible because, say, it supplied insufficient protection to the victim.

Lastly, but no less powerful, the legislation would extend fair employment provisions of the 1964 civil rights act to include states and political subdivisions; mainly, it would provide for integration of state and local police forces, penal institution staffs and other operations associated with justice.

The bill expected to be submitted later by the Justice Department probably will be similar to the rights groups' bill, sources say. The agency's measure may be less ambitious in some respects, but it is expected to go into one field not covered in the current bill, discrimination in housing.

NEGRO PROTESTS UPHELD BY COURT

5 Louisiana Convictions Are Voided—Black Dissents

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Feb. 23—The Supreme Court struck down today breach of peace convictions of five Negro "stand-in" demonstrators who had attempted to integrate a Louisiana public library.

The 5-to-4 decision drew a heated dissent from Justice Hugo Black, who saw in it a ruling that all such demonstrations in public buildings were protected by the Constitution.

But the majority decision, as expressed in three different opinions, appeared to stop short of that position.

Justice Abe Fortas said in an opinion joined by Chief Justice Earl Warren and Justice William O. Douglas that there was no evidence that the Negroes had breached the peace. He pointed out that they had entered a "white only" library in Clinton, La., to demonstrate their objection to segregation.

Negroes, he said, were allowed to obtain books only from a blue bookmobile. They were issued library cards stamped "Negro."

Asked for a Book

One of the five men asked for a nonexistent book, and when the librarian asked them to leave, they refused. Nobody else was in the library, and the men stood quietly until the sheriff arrived and made the arrest.

The entire incident, which occurred on March 7, 1964, took only 10 to 15 minutes.

The five were sentenced to fines of $150 or 90 days in jail.

Justice Fortas said the Negroes' action did not amount to a violation of the breach-of-peace law and that the conviction amounted to a denial of the process of law.

The disagreement with Justice Black arose out of Justice Fortas's further statement that the "stand-in" demonstrators would be protected against prosecution under the law anyway, because their protest was expression protected by the First Amendment to the Constitution.

"Can any provision of the United States Constitution tell any citizens—white or colored—they can march with impunity into a public library and demonstrate against some public policy!" Justice Black views can be transformed into a loud, boisterous, arrant, dangerous mob," he said.

"It has become automatic for people to be turned loose as long as whatever they do has something to do with race. That is not the way I read the Constitution," he said.

Justices Tom C. Clark, John M. Harlan and Potter Stewart joined in Justice Black's written dissent.

Justice William J. Brennan said in a concurring opinion that the breach-of-peace statute had been doeclared to be unconstitutionally vague in a 1965 decision, and that the same defect would apply in this case.

Justice Byron R. White concurred. He said ordering the Negroes out of the library because of their color denied them equal protection of the laws.

Carl Rachlin of New York argued for the Negroes. Richard Kilbourne of Clinton argued for Louisiana.

TAUNTED ABOUT AGE, GIRL GOES BERSERK

BRISTOL, England (AP)—Geoffrey Hodges, 42 years old, said he had learned the hard way that a girl's age is no joking matter.

It happened, he said, at a recent wedding party. He asked Miss Sylvia Hallett her age and she said 25. Mr. Hodges suggested that she looked nearer 45. And then it started.

Miss Hallett, who is in fact 19, was charged in court the next day with causing damage of £81 9 s. ($228) to furniture and windows in an attack on Mr. Hodges.

"I just had to express myself," she said.

The host and hostess, Graham Morgan and his bride, took refuge in a bedroom as coffee cups and glasses went flying in Mr. Hodges's direction. By the time the police arrived everything in the room was overturned and two windows were broken.

Miss Hallett admitted breaking the windows but testified that others at the party did some of the throwing.

Mr. Hodges, who suffered a bruised nose and torn coat, testified that his remark about her age was meant only as a joke.

The court fined Miss Hallett £5 ($14) plus £6 ($16.80) in costs.

AC -3/2/66

AMERICUS, Ga. (UPI)—A jury of 10 white and two Negro men was seated Tuesday night in the murder trial of Negro Charles Lee Hopkins, 23, accused of murder in the death of a white Marine recruit last July during a tense civil rights situation.

The jury was selected and then locked up for the night after 10 hours of courtroom questioning. Testimony was scheduled to start at 9 a.m. Wednesday.

The jurors, and two white alternates, were qualified on the death penalty.

Hopkins and Eddie James Lamar were indicted for murder in connection with the shooting death of Andy Whatley, 21, shortly before midnight July 28.

Whatley was gunned down from a passing car just two blocks away from where a Negro civil rights group was staging a protest vigil at the Sumter County courthouse where Hopkins' trial is being held.

Lamar has not yet been tried.

Defense attorney C. B. King and Sol. J. Frank Myers questioned prospective jurors in groups of 12. Nine Negroes were among the 150 prospective veniremen called. One white man was excused from duty when he said he was prejudiced against Negroes.

The trial began Monday with Judge T. O. Marshall rejecting a defense motion to change the site of the trial.

Negro Admitted Shot, Court Told

AJ 3/2/66

By WALKER LUNDY
Atlanta Journal Staff Writer

AMERICUS, Ga., March 2—A Negro service station operator Wednesday testified defendant Charles Lee Hopkins admitted firing a gun the night of July 28, the same night Hopkins is charged with shooting down a white youth on a downtown street corner.

"I know I shot, but I didn't know I shot nobody," James Miles quoted Hopkins as saying about 75 minutes after the alleged shooting.

Miles was the first witness as the state opened its case against Hopkins, the first of two Americus Negroes charged with the shooting of Aultman Andrew Whatley, 21.

The other Negro charged with the killing, Eddie James Lamar, 22, will go on trial after Hopkins, who is 23.

MILES, WHO said he was looking for Hopkins after police had notified him, said he asked the defendant where his gun was.

"I ain't got none," Miles quoted Hopkins as answering.

Miles said Hopkins and Lamar and two Negro girls had been in his station earlier in the evening to buy gasoline.

"I asked him where he was going," Miles said. "He said, 'Just riding.' He said he didn't have his 'heat' with him."

On cross examination, Miles said he did not know what Hopkins meant by this remark.

Miles said that when he saw Hopkins after the shooting, the defendant was willing to telephone police and made no suggestion of escaping.

Sol. Gen. J. Frank Myers said in his opening statement that he hoped to prove civil rights demonstrations — including the one in progress at the time of the shooting — had no connection with Whatley's death.

"THE DEFENDANT and the deceased were not involved in demonstrations and didn't even know each other," Myers told the jury.

Two Negro girls, Lizzie Sheffield and Catherine Taylor, both said they saw Hopkins earlier in the evening and testified he had a gun with him then.

An Americus pawnshop owner testified he sold a snubnosed .38-caliber pistol to a Negro who identified himself as Charles Lee Hopkins seven weeks before the shooting.

O. W. Ray, who operates a pawnshop with his son, testified the pistol introduced by the state as an exhibit bears the same serial number as the one sold to the Negro. He said he could not identify the defendant.

Selection of a jury, which has two Negroes on it, was a painstakingly slow process Tuesday. It took more than nine hours of questioning of potential jurors, mostly by defense attorney C. B. King, civil rights lawyer from Albany.

Hopkins and Lamar are charged with the slaying July 28 of Whatley, a 21-year-old Marine recruit.

Mr. King's adversary, Sol. Gen. Myers, will be trying his third murder case since his appointment to the office three months ago. He has gained two convictions.

THE PICKING OF an integrated jury marked the second time in two weeks that Negroes have been seated on juries in this area, which was known last summer for its racial troubles.

A jury of 11 Negroes and one white man convicted a Negro youth of manslaughter in nearby Ellaville. Myers and King were attorneys in that case, too.

The all-male jury includes Negrows Hiawatha Ross, a warehouse laborer, and Emmitt Battle, a farmer. Whites on the jury are Julian Suggs Jr., J. W. Keane, Perry West, K. L. Carpenter, Johnny Dixon, L. B. Eubanks, Frank Chappell Jr., C. D. Williams, Robert Buchanan and W. M. Lucas.

Two white alternates also were selected, Roy L. Parker III and Garnett Wilson.

The opening day of the trial moved slowly. King meticulously asked each of the 51 men summoned to the jury box if they thought the fact that the defendant and the defendant's lawyer are Negro would influence the jurymen's ability to be impartial. All answered no.

HE ASKED IF they knew any of the individuals involved in the case or if they were members—or had friends who were members—of the Ku Klux Klan, the Knights of the White Camelia, the White Citizens Council or the John Birch Society. Most said they knew Myers and some of the police officers scheduled to testify. None claimed klan membership, and only a handful said they or their friends were in the Birch society. None of the Birchites were selected for the jury.

House Votes to Authorize 17 New U.S. Judges in South

By REMER TYSON
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — The House authorized Wednesday appointment of 45 new federal district judges and 10 U.S. circuit judges — four of them in the Southwide Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, which has handled the bulk of civil rights litigation.

The judgeship bill gives President Lyndon B. Johnson a new bundle of patronage and could lead to the appointment of a Negro federal judge in the South.

House passage was by a vote of 371 to 23. The Senate approved a similar bill last year, providing for one fewer district judge than the House version.

Two Georgia congressmen, Republican Howard H. (Bo) Callaway of Pine Mountain and Democrat Maston O'Neal of Bainbridge, voted against the House bill.

Rep. Elliott Hagan of Sylvania did not vote. The seven other Georgia congressmen voted for the bill.

Thirteen of the 45 district judgeships are in Southern states. None is in Georgia.

The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, which adds four temporary judges, has jurisdiction in Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, Texas and the Canal Zone.

Two members of the existing nine-judge fifth circuit recently submitted their resignations to the President.

Johnson therefore will make six new appointments in the circuit.

The most likely appointment of a Negro to a Southern federal court bench would be in Florida, which gets four new district judges.

The administration would likely receive less opposition to nomination of a Negro from Florida's senators than from senators in the other Southern states receiving the new judges.

Louisiana gets four new judges, Texas and Mississippi receive two each and one goes to Alabama.

The bill becomes effective when signed by the President except in California, where five new judges will be appointed in newly created judicial distriicts. The California changes will become effective six months after enactment.

Integrated Sumter Jury Sentences Negro to Life

AMERICUS, Ga. (AP)—A jury of 10 white men and two Negroes convicted a 23-year-old Negro of murder and sentenced him to life imprisonment Thursday in the slaying of a white youth during racial tension last summer.

The jury, deliberated an hour and three minutes before convicting Charles Lee Hopkins in the pistol slaying of Andrew Aultman Whatley Jr., 21, who was shot down on a street corner last July.

Hopkins admitted in an unsworn statement to the jury that he fired a revolver from an automobile, but said he shot in fear and did not know he had killed anyone.

Hopkins' attorney, C. B. King of Albany, Ga., said he would determine later whether to appeal for a new trial.

Hopkins and another Negro, Eddie James Lamar, 22, were indicted for murder in the slaying.

Lamar is expected to go on trial Friday.

King, a 41-year-old Negro attorney, told the jury he wanted only justice — not black man's justice or white man's justice.

He told the jury:

"I ask you not for a black man's justic, nor for a white man's justice — simply for a fellow human being such as yourself to sit in judgment of the facts in such a cause that it will cause all of us to bow down and worship the cause of justice."

The prosecutor, Sol Gen. Frank Myers, called the slaying cold-blooded and asked that the jury send Hopkins to the electric chair. Myers, 45, appointed to his office about three months ago, called the slaying, "Cold blooded murder without any doubt."

As he painted a mental picture of what he called murder with malice, Mrs. Andrew Whatley Sr., mother of the victim, continually wiped tears from her eyes as she sat in the front row of the crowded courtroom.

Most of the jurors kept their eyes on Myers.

"He (Whatley) was standing there in the peace of the county he knows as his home, and out of the night came a car which cut him down," Myers said.

Several white men who had been in the crowd tsetified that a car appeared from a side street and several shots were fired as it reached the intersection where the crowd of white persons had gathered.

Police testified there had been incidents of rock throwing at cars driven by white persons at this corner earlier.

Whatley, who had enlisted in the Marine Corps only a few days before he was killed, fell mortally wounded less than two blocks from the Sumter County court house where more than 30 marches were staged during about a three-week period.

Hopkins, a tall, thin, dark-skinned Negro, told his side of the story in an unsworn statement which must, under Georgia law, be considered by the jury without benefit of cross-examination.

He is a former service station attendant and still faces liquor charges in Sumter County.

He said he fired only after objects had been hurled at his car, and after someone from the crowd had shouted he was going to be killed.

"When I fired my gun, I had my head down. I have a glass eye (left) which I have had since I was 16 years old," Hopkins said.

"I did not see where I fired."

Dr. Herman Jones, director of the state crime lab at Atlanta, testified that test showed a 38 caliber slug taken from the victim's brain came from a revolver owned by Hopkins.

Another state witness, O. W. Ray, a pawnbroker, testified that his pawnshop had sold Hopkins the revolver which had fired the fatal bullet.

Police Sgt. Thomas Hewett testified that he and another policeman gave chase to a car immediately after the shooting, and that when the vehicle wrecked, Lamar was taken into custody.

Hopkins surrendered to police through a friend later during the night of the slaying.

One witness, Basil Roberts, a white man, testified he was standing near Whatley when the youth fell to the ground and that he (Roberts) ran into the street and began firing a revolver at the fleeing automobile.

"I'LL TELL you one thing," said George Gooding, "when we went in that jury room it wasn't 11 niggers and a white man. It was 12 Schley County jurors."

Gooding, a 45-year-old stock clerk for an auto parts company, was the only white man on a jury that recently convicted a Negro youth of manslaughter and sentenced him to six years in the shooting death of an Ellaville policeman.

A few white residents of the area have criticized the verdict as too lenient, but Gooding defends it and declares: "If I had it to do over, I'd just as soon serve on the jury with the same 11 men."

Schley County is one of six largely rural counties in the Southwestern Judicial Circuit that began calling Negroes for jury duty after a 1964 Georgia Court of Appeals decision overturned the assault conviction of a civil rights worker in one of the counties (Sumter). The decision was based on systematic exclusion of Negroes from the trial jury.

Mr. Nelson is a writer for the Los Angeles Times.

NATIVE GEORGIAN

Negroes had always been restricted to a dark Jim Crow balcony in the old red brick courthouse here but for the murder trial of Charlie Hunter, 16, they sat in the main courtroom.

Officer John A. Harden was shot to death and jailer Kermot O. Greene was stabbed seriously after they stopped Hunter and his 19-year-old brother, Willie James, on a speeding charge.

The youth admitted the shooting and the stabbing, but said he was protecting his brother.

"I got the knife out of my pocket and I cut Mr. Greene before he had a chance to shoot him (Willie James Hunter) and I shot the policeman," he said.

Gooding, a native Georgian who spent 10 years in the Army, said that at first he was "shook up" to find himself serving on a jury with 11 Negroes.

"Nothing like that had happened before and it gave me a little, funny feeling," he said, "but it worked out fine."

C. B. King, a Negro civil rights attorney from Albany who represented Hunter, used all 20 of his peremptory challenges to excuse whites.

ELECTED FOREMAN

Solicitor Gen. J. Frank Myers used his peremptory challenges to exclude eight Negroes and two white women.

Schley County, predominantly Negro, had not been directly touched by the civil rights movement and the traditional paternalistic relationship between whites and Negroes had endured to a great extent.

But Gooding, whose father was a plantation overseer, said he always has felt Negroes should be equal participants in government. "They're taxpayers, too," he said.

Gooding has lived in Schley County 20 years and knew all of the Negro jurors personally. Most of them were farmers or farm workers.

He said they told him: "Mr. George, we ain't never served on a jury before so you gotta kinda help us along."

"I said I'd do the best I could," Gooding said. "I told them, 'somebody's got to be elected foreman and because there's 11 of y'all and one of me, it'd be better to elect one of y'all.' "

While the question was being discussed, Gooding excused himself to go to the rest room. "When I came back," he says, one of them said: 'We done elected you foreman.' "

Gooding said the Negroes were intelligent, if not well educated. Some were a little hesitant at first about expressing their opinions, he said, "But I told them to use their good judgment and they soon began talking."

The verdict required six or seven ballots and almost two hours of deliberation, Gooding recalled.—(c1966.)

Meeting the Violence

SUPREME Court decisions Monday in Georgia and Mississippi cases substantially strengthen the hand of the federal government in dealing with intimidation and violence against Negroes in the South.

We think most thoughtful Southerners will see that as their gain.

Murder, even when everyone knew it was that, has occurred with impunity in scores of cases in the South in the past few years.

We have all witnessed the tawdry business of state juries' quickly releasing the bombers, burners and killers. Frequently, in such cases, we have seen official state prosecutors joining in the farce, publicly arguing against their own cases and then failing to attempt any effective prosecution.

The performance of prosecutors in Lowndes County, Ala., some time ago was extremely irregular in this regard. The Alabama attorney general himself moved into the cases to prosecute. Probably he knew it was futile; but effectively or not, he sought to establish that in Alabama there at least would be some prosecution in such Black Belt cases.

The failure of many of the states' courts in this respect, combined with their exclusion of Negroes from juries, has meant that the lawless element frequently was free to do as it would without real danger of penalty — unless the federal courts could act against them.

To a considerable extent, the federal courts' authority lies in Reconstruction-era statutes that are weak. Murder is a state crime, not a federal crime. What federal authorities have argued, in using the old federal statutes, is that in certain circumstances if a Negro is murdered because he is a Negro his alleged attackers may be prosecuted not only for murder, in state courts, but also for conspiracy to violate his civil rights, in federal courts.

The problem has been that some lower federal courts, including the one in Middle Georgia, have construed the federal law so narrowly that federal prosecution has been halted. The effect of the new Supreme Court rulings is to broaden the bases upon which prosecution may proceed under the old federal statutes.

Locally drawn juries in federal courts will still have to decide guilt or innocence. But at least, in the federal courts, effective prosecution and a fair bench are likely. The outcomes are more likely to rest upon the facts in the case than upon the eye-winking tolerance of some local officialdoms.

The federal code sections used in such cases still make prosecution extremely difficult. There are now proposals to tighten federal law in such cases and proposals to assure fairer jury selection. These proposals get to the greatest weaknesses, but the Supreme Court's latest clarifying rulings help.

State Seeks Return Of 20 Rights Cases

COURTS

The State of Georgia will go before the U.S. Supreme Court this month in an attempt to have 20 civil rights cases returned to the jurisdiction of the state court.

Representing Georgia before the court will be Fulton assistant solicitors George K. McPherson and Robert Sparks. McPherson is scheduled to be admitted to practice before the high court on the same day he is to argue.

The cases have been battered around the state and federal courts since 1963 when a group of demonstrators were arrested in downtown Atlanta.

After being indicted by the Fulton County Grand Jury on charges of violating Georgia's anti-trespass law, the defendants asked the U.S. District Court to assume jurisdiction.

District Judge Boyd Sloan remanded the case to Fulton Superior Court and the defendants filed an appeal to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals.

Subsequently, the Court of Appeals in a 2-to-1 decision reversed the lower federal court, thus placing the sit-in cases within the jurisdiction of the federal courts.

APRIL 18 HEARING

Georgia, through the Fulton solicitor's office, then appealed the Court of Appeals decision to the U.S. Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court has set a hearing for oral arguments during the week of April 18.

If the Court of Appeals decision is reversed, the 20 civil rights cases will be returned to the jurisdiction of Fulton Superior Court and probably will be tried before Judge Durwood Pye.

Georgia Courts Are Poorly Run, Judge Declares

By DICK HEBERT

Georgia's courts are a hodge-podge collection of poorly run "judicial kingdoms" that must be saved from politics, Court of Appeals Judge Robert H. Hall said Thursday.

Hall called for sweeping reform in the state's court system at the opening session of the Citizens' Conference on Georgia's Judicial System at the Downtown Holiday Inn.

Each of Georgia's 40 judicial circuits is "a judicial knigdom with its own jealously guarded prerogatives," he said. "Even within the same circuit where there is more than one superior court judge, we find separate kingdoms.

LACK OF UNIFORMITY

He bitterly attacked the lack of uniformity throughout the scales of Georgia courts, the lack of modern administrative practices, and the fact "politics, to most of our superior court judges, is a matter of survival."

"Make no mistake about it," Hall said. "The Georgia judiciary is in politics. . . . It is the fault of the system in which they are placed, and the fault of the people who established this system."

He said the system of electing judges, and politically appointing the others, should be replaced by naming judges and then letting them prove their merit after "a sufficient term."

The judge then would "go before the people on his record, for their approval or disapproval without any political opposition." He said such a method has been suggested in Georgia since 1896, and despite the backing of the bar of Georgia it has failed to gain legislative sup-

ON HIS RECORD

The judge then would "go before the people on his record, for their approval or disapproval without any political opposition." He said such a method has been suggested in Georgia since 1896, and despite the backing of the bar of Georgia it has failed to gain legislative support.

Reform of Georgia's courts has been fought for since the 1920s and every effort failed.

"We must not fail again," Hall said. "Today the world is in transit. Social pressures are testing the very existence of our form of government. The law itself is in jeopardy.

"The jurisdiction of our state courts is being constantly taken over by a more modern federal system. . .

He said the need for uniformity is among the greatest needs today. In the 40 superior court circuits of Georgia, he said, there are:

30 juvenile courts, 56 city courts, eight special civil and criminal courts, five county courts, four municipal courts, 159 courts of ordinary, 11 small claims courts, two magistrates courts, about 2,427 justice of the peace courts and "Lord knows how many recorder's, police and mayor's courts.

"All are independent of each other. Many have their own separate rules of practice. Their jurisdictions are conflicting and overlapping. There are various methods of multiple appeals.

"All of this produces confsion and delays on and on and on ad nausea."

Pay received by judges is hodge-podge, he said. So is the work load.

"Our Georgia judicial system is truly a many splintered thing."

$3 MILLION

Hall told the conferees Georgia has no supervisory power vested in the highest appellate court, no court administrator to help supervise and coordinate court operations, no program or standards of recuiting, promoting or compensating court personnel, no uniform procedures for preparing court budgets or buying court supplies and no statistical system.

"The operation of all the courts of Georgia involves a state expenditure of just under $3 million. While this is only four tenths of one per cent of the state's total budget, the Georgia Court system is big business in a real sense.

"Any private business of this magnitude which attempted to compete in the modern business world without these common tools of business management would not be in business very long."

Group Says 4 Changes Needed; Emphasizes Judges Not at Fault

By JOHN ASKINS

More than 100 leading Georgians condemned the state's court system Saturday after studying it intensively during a three day Citizens' Conference on Georgia's Judicial System here.

They agreed drastic changes are needed in four areas and elected a 14-man permanent committee headed by Julius McCurdy of Decatur to work for the changes.

"The Georgia judicial system is antiquated and inefficient," the citizens said in a consensus statement approved at the final meeting of the conference.

"We have an excessive number of courts with conflicting and overlapping jurisdictions, and without any semblance of over-all organization or administration."

It was emphasized often during the conference that the system, not the state's judges, is at fault.

"THE SYSTEM FAILS to insure that those most qualified to serve as judges will serve. Our judges have greatly unequal work loads with a resultant waste of judicial manpower and needless delays. All judges are now elected, thereby subjecting them to partisan politics and jeopardizing the basic principle of an impartial judiciary.

"These deficiencies demand correction.

"We are not concerned here with fundamental rights, but rather with the machinery of government by which these rights are protected and enforced. The judicial system is not an end in itself. It is a means by which the great end of equal justice under the rule of law may be made a living reality. In a dynamic society, the system must change to meet changing conditions," said the citizens.

The four areas needing change, according to the statement, were court organization and administration, judicial selection and tenure, judge discipline, retirement and removal, and courts of limited and special jurisdiction.

The citizens said the state's appellate court structure is generally satisfactory, but the trial court system is "obsolete." They called for creation of one court of general trial jurisdiction, to be known as the Superior Court, which would sit in "divisions" according to types of crimes.

"JUDGES WOULD PERFORM the judicial functions in this court, while ministerial functions would be executed by other personnel under the supervisory control of the superior court. Police, traffic and other similar matters should be handled by magistrates appointed by and under the supervision of the superior court."

The statement said judges should be freed from "the inefficiency and insecurity of Georgia's present elective system. They should be nominated by a nonpartisan commission and appointed by the governor, or by the chief justice if the appointment has not been made by the governor within a specific time.

"Judges should not run for re-election against opposing candidates, but their names should be submitted to the voters after a reasonable period of service, under a ballot which provides, "Should Judge—be retained in office? Yes—No—."

Impeachment, said the citizens, "has failed as a means of judicial discipline and removal. A commission should be established, comprised of judges, lawyers and laymen, to investigate complaints and conduct hearings thereon.

"If a complaint is found to be meritorious, this fact should be certified to the Supreme Court, which would render its decision on the record made before the commission."

A compulsory judge retirement age should be established, the citizens said, with adequate compensation for retirement due to age after a designated term of service or due to disability.

"IN LIEU OF several classes of special courts, there should be a single court of general jurisdiction as mentioned above, containing such divisions as may be necessary to deal with special problems, such as juvenile matters, probate, and small claims," the statement said.

Elected to the executive committee for a permanent citizens' organization to work for the recommendations were the following:

Julius McCurdy, Decatur, chairman; Joseph J. Hutton, Savannah; Carl Roundtree, Dawson; Alf O. Blackmar, Columbus; H. G. Patillo, Decatur; Harold T. Patterson, Atlanta; W. Cameron Mitchell, Hampton; Howard Ector, Marietta; A. L. Dean, Valdosta; Dewey F. Holland, Lavonia; Louis C. Harris, Augusta; John A. Sibley, Mrs. Grace Hamilton and W. T. Montague, all of Atlanta.

Atlantan Convicted In Flag Case

COURTS

CORDELE, Ga. (AP)—A Superior Court jury convicted a 19-year-old Atlanta Negro Friday of flag desecration after the jury was sent back to deliberate for a second time. The sentence will be passed Monday.

Judge Wendell Horne rejected the jury's first announcement of a guilty verdict against Rufus Hinton when one of the two Negro jurors, 87-year-old Gene Kendrick, indicated he was not sure about the decision.

Kendrick told defense attorney C. B. King of Albany, when asked if he had agreed with the verdict:

"I guess so. I'm with the crowd."

Horne then sent the jury out for further deliberation. While the jury was out, the judge rejected King's motions calling for a mistrial and for further questioning of Kendrick. Horne said the elderly man had been questioned by the state and defense before he was seated on the jury.

King said in his mistrial motion that Kendrick was either under duress or was incompetent.

Rufas Hinton, one of six persons charged with ripping down the Georgia flag during a racial demonstration at the Crisp County Courthouse March 31, is the first to be tried on the rare charge.

In an unsworn statement today, Hinton told the court he took it upon himself to lower the flag to half staff during the demonstration.

Fortas Spoke To the Living

By a happy—and revealing—coincidence, U.S. Senator Samuel J. Ervin, Jr., of North Carolina, spoke at a Bar Association meeting on the evening before "Law Day, U.S.A." was celebrated by the law school students and faculty at Emory University (Atlanta) with U.S. Supreme Court Justice Fortas as the speaker. The coincidence provided the symbolism of light following darkness, of hope replacing defeatism, of the dead past trying to speak for the living present.

Senator Ervin's view of the meaning of laws is, if one judges from reports of his address, that of mechanical details: "Thou shalt brush thy teeth at least twice daily" "thou shalt not spit on the widewalk," etc. "Laws", he said, are designed to furnish rules of conduct for government and people."

The Meaning

But are they? Is that all? Is that what we really mean by the majesty and breadth of the word "law" and the phrase "due processes of law"? Hasn't the senator used a beautiful, wide fabric of principles woven by the laws of centuries to wrap up municipal ordinances and all the petty ambiguities of "states rights"?

The senator doesn't like the U.S. Supreme Court. He sees its "whims" replacing "laws." He deplores and views with alarm the fact that a Supreme Court of today may over-rule one of 1860-1840—or any "past decision."

Surely the senator does not mean that the dead hand of the past must relentlessly hold us in its grasp no matter what the changes? Is it now, after all, a "whim" of the U.S. Supreme Court to rule that if a large percentage of the people move to

The senator doesn't like the U.S. Supreme Court. He sees its "whims" replacing "laws." He deplores and views with alarm the fact that a Supreme Court of today may over-rule one of 1860-1840—or any "past decision."

Surely the senator does not mean that the dead hand of the past must relentlessly hold us in its grasp no matter what the changes? Is it now, after all, a "whim" of the U.S. Supreme Court to rule that if a large percentage of the people move to cities, the states may not continue to give the depopulated areas the same representation as those with many more citizens? Is the "one man, one vote" ruling a "whim" or is it an upholding of the supreme constitutional guarantee of a republican or representative form of government?

The 13th, the 14th, and the 15th amendments have been in the U.S .Constitution for about 100 years. Beginning in the late 1870's and continuing into the 20th century, they were largely nullified by court rulings and political and economic pressures, mostly from the financial centers of the East and North. Is it, let us ask ourselves, merely a "whim" that these near-century-old amendments are declared valid?

Old Fears

Senator Ervin's fears are as old as the nation. He is saying the same things that were said of the Supreme Court in old John Marshall's time—only not so strongly. From that day to this, rulings that have served the American promise and dream have been condemned by the fearful and the greedy. Yet, can anyone deny that individual rights and dignity are more strongly delineated today than ever in our history?

Mr. Justice Fortas's talk was inspiring. It breathed confidence in the American dream of a country where each citizen enjoys equal protection of the law, where there are no discriminations in voting and in an equal sharing of opportunity and education, and where we try to alleviate and get at the causes of poverty.

Mr. Justice Fortas believes we do subscribe to this sort of a country because of the great principles of law in the Constitution and its amendments—also because they and our religious origins have given us a sense of moral consciousness about the individual. It is these principles of law, not the police court rules or the states laws governing conduct, that enable us to "channel this evolution of our free society into the broad banks of the law." Justice Fortas looks forward with hope and confidence. He was neither petulant nor defeatist. Senator Ervin was, it seemed, plaintively looking backward.

ELECTIONEER LAW IN ALABAMA UPSET

High Court Voids Trial for Editorial on Voting Day

By FRED P. GRAHAM
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 23—The Supreme Court declared unconstitutional today an Alabama law under which a Birmingham editor has been prosecuted for publishing an editorial on election day.

Describing the 51-year-old law as an "obvious and flagrant abridgement of the constitutionally guaranteed freedom of the press," Justice Hugo L. Black, for the court, threw out the case against James E. Mills, editor of The Birmingham Post-Herald.

Justice Black pointed out that the decision would not affect the 37 state laws that merely prohibit campaigning near polling places.

Alabama's law made it a crime for anyone on election day to "do any electioneering or to solicit any votes or to promise to cast any votes" for or against any candidate or proposition at issue.

Lawyers for Alabama told the court the law's purpose was to prevent last-minute charges that could not be answered before the election was held.

Justice Black said this argument contained a "fatal flaw" — politicians could make their last-minute charges the day before the election, and the opposition would be left without time to reply.

Laws in Three States

Oregon, North Dakota and Montana have similar laws, though there are no indications that they have been used to silence the press.

Alabama's law had never been invoked in a recorded case, either, until The Post-Herald took up the cudgel in 1962 against Birmingham's two most prominent segregationist politicians, Mayor Art Hanes and Police Commissioner Eugene T. Connor.

Mr. Mills began to press for a change to a mayor-city council form of government, which was widely understood to be an effort to set Birmingham on a moderate racial course by eliminating the positions held by Mayor Hanes and Commissioner Connor.

In the morning newspaper on Nov. 6, Election Day, Mr. Mills published an editorial charging that Mayor Hanes had tried to "buy the votes of city employes" with a promise of a pay rise and had forbidden them to discuss public business with the press. He concluded:

"Birmingham and the people of Birmingham deserve a better break. A vote for mayor-council government will give it to them."

Proposition Carried

The mayor-council proposition carried, but Mr. Mills was arrested for violation of the anti-electioneering law. If convicted, he could have been sentenced to as much as six months at hard labor.

A trial judge ruled the law unconstitutional before the trial date, but the Supreme Court of Alabama reinstated the charge. It acknowledged that the law limited both speech and press, but held that the limitation was not unreasonable.

According to Justice Black's opinion, Mr. Mills's editorial was precisely the sort of expression the First Amendment was intended to protect. He said:

"Suppression of the right of the press to praise or criticize Governmental agents and to clamor and contend for or against change, which is all that this editorial did, muzzles one of the very agencies the framers of our Constitution thoughtfully and deliberately selected to improve our society and keep it free."

Justice John Marshall Harlan was the only member of the Court who did not join in the opinion. He said that the Supreme Court should not have reviewed the case until Mr. Mills had been actually convicted and the Alabama Supreme Court had considered the case again.

Justice Harlan captioned his opinion a "separate opinion rather than a dissent, and said that but for the procedural problem he would have ruled for Mr. Mills because the law was unconstitutionally vague.

In response, Justice William O. Douglas, joined by Justice William J. Brennan Jr., said in a separate concurring opinion that the Supreme Court could bypass its usual procedures to review quickly cases involving freedom of expression.

He cited the friend-of-court brief by the Alabama and Southern Press Associations, which said that since Mr. Mills's arrest, editorial comment on election day had been nonexistent in Alabama.

Supreme Court Actions

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 23—The Supreme Court took the following actions today:

CONSERVATION

Ruled, 6 to 3, that a Federal law forbidding the discharge of "refuse" into navigable streams covers an accidental discharge of valuable fuel oil into a river (No. 291, United States v. Standard Oil Company).

CRIMINAL LAW

Declared unconstitutional an Alabama corrupt practices law that was used as a basis for an indictment against a Birminghm newspaper editor who urged voters to vote a particular way in an Election Day editorial (No. 597, Mills v. Alabama).

Agreed to decide whether a convicted narcotics pusher's sixth Amendment right to confront his accusers was violated when the police arrested him on an informer's tip, found heroin in his possession and then refused to produce the informer in court (No. 1037, Misc., renumbered 1340, McCray v. Illinois).

Ruled unanimously that a Federal law that punishes embezzlement by employes of "any firm" engaged in commerce as a common carrier applies to the employes of individuals doing business as common carriers (No. 256, United States v. Cook).

LABOR LAW

Upheld, 7 to 1, a lower court's ruling that the strike-bound Florida East Coast Railway may deviate from the terms of its labor contract to make the changes reasonably necessary to continue to operate (No. 750, Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks v. Florida East Coast Railway; No. 782, United States v. Florida East Coast Railway; No. 783, Florida East Coast Railway v. United States).

Agreed to decide whether the American Red Cross is an "instrumentality of the United States" and thus exempt from Colorado unemployment compensation taxes (No. 1071, Colorado Department of Employment v. United States).

TAXATION

Ruled unanimously that Ben Blue, a Hollywood entertainer, may be tried for income tax evasion despite his contention that the Government forced him to incriminate himself by requiring him to respond first to civil proceedings for tax deficiencies (No. 531, United States v. Blue).

The proceedings in the Supreme Court yesterday are listed in detail on Page 76.

Julian Bond to Get Court Review

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, June 20—Julian Bond, the 26-year-old Negro pacifist who was denied his seat in the Georgia Legislature after making anti-Vietnam war statements, was granted a hearing today by the Supreme Court.

A three-judge Federal District Court in Atlanta had ruled against Mr. Bond, 2 to 1, on Feb. 10.

Mr. Bond was elected last year to the Georgia House of Representatives from Atlanta. On Jan. 6, he told reporters he supported a statement critical of American policies in Vietnam put out by the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee. Mr. Bond is the committee's publicity director.

When asked for his views on the burning of draft cards, he said he would not burn his own but admired the courage of those who did.

On Jan. 10 the House voted not to seat Mr. Bond on the ground that his views disqualified him from taking the oath to uphold the United States Constitution.

The three-judge lower court ruled that his public statements could reasonably be said to be repugnant to the oath, and that racial prejudice was not the motive behind the House's action.

Today's decision was announced in a brief unsigned order. Justice William O. Douglas took no part in the action but gave no reason why. The case will be set for argument at the next term of Court, which begins in October.

A special election to fill Mr. Bond's seat was subsequently held on Feb. 23 and Mr. Bond won without opposition. However, the Legislature adjourned Feb. 18 without taking action on a petition to prevent him again from

A Judge in Mississippi

COURTS

Claude Feemster Clayton

NYT 9/16/66

FEDERAL Judge Claude Feemster Clayton found himself yesterday once again trying to deal even-handedly between his white and Negro neighbors in Mississippi, and he thought of his son, Claude Jr., a freshman at Tulane University where he is beginning pre-law studies. "I hope he changes his mind," the judge confided. "The law is a demanding profession."

Man in the News

The case before Judge Clayton may have been especially demanding for a Mississippian born and bred. It was an injunction application from the Justice Department to force officials in Grenada, Miss., to protect Negro children at newly integrated schools.

Since President Eisenhower appointed him to the Federal bench in 1958, Judge Clayton has sat in one of the law's most demanding seats. In his first year, he was a member of a three-judge panel that threw out a challenge from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People to the state's educational requirements for voters.

In 1962, when James Meredith was seeking admission to the University of Mississippi amid scenes of violence and rioting, the judge had to rule on the ambiguous role of former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker and acted, finally, to commit the general for a psychiatric examination..

Voided Poll Tax

In 1963, he acted to stop harassment of a Negro voter registration drive in Greenwood. In 1965, he ordered a circuit clerk in Clarksdale to stop applying stricter voter requirements for Negroes than for whites. And in April of this year, again sitting as part of a three-judge panel, he voided Mississippi's $2 poll tax in state and local elections.

Does that record make him a liberal or a conservative?

"He can't be designated either way," said a newsman from the judge's home town of Tulepo. "You have to think of him as a man dedicated to judicial procedures and to the law. Nobody ever found fault with him for being partial."

The judge is a former major general in the National Guard—he commanded the 31st Infantry, sometimes called the Dixie Division—and he runs his courtroom with barracks room authority.

"He is never overbearing," an old friend from Tupelo said, "but all he has to do is infer he wants something done and people do it. His is the best run court in the state."

Now 57-years old—he was born Aug. 4, 1909—Judge Clayton had been a lawyer for 35 years. His father, also called Claude, was a Circuit Court judge, and he was graduated from the University of Mississippi in 1931 and admitted to the bar the same year.

While building up a practice, he was active in Democratic politics and was an early supporter of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. He was prosecutor of Lee County from 1935 to 1938 and then put in a term as a Circuit Court judge.

(Judge Clayton at Federal court yesterday.)

He served in Europe in the Army during World War II and met General Eisenhower during a brief tour at Supreme Allied Headquarters in London. Later, he was transferred to the Ninth Army and fought his way through Holland and Germany. He was discharged as a colonel.

Returning to Tulepo after the war, he resumed law practice and an active role in politics. Twice—in 1946 and in 1948—he unsuccessfully challenged John E. Rankin for the Democratic nomination for the First Congressional District seat. In both races he was identified as a white supremacist.

After the second loss, in which he ran a poor third to Mr. Rankin, a political crony said he just did not have the common touch to woo backwoods voters.

The judge married Bronson Elizabeth Munday in 1940. They have two other children besides Claude Jr. —Bronson, also a student at Tulane, and Mrs. Nelson Tyrone of Charlottesville, Va. The family lives in a big house on Tulepo's Belledeer Drive. The house is set on a rolling three-acre plot, covered with many trees and a smooth lawn the judge likes to look after himself.

The judge is 5-feet 10-inches tall, broad shouldered, and he trimly carries his 190 pounds. He has a full face, highly arching brows and dark wavy hair he describes as "hair-colored, or nondescript."

His only diversion besides reading history is hunting. "I shoot a little bit of everything," he said. "Quail, waterfowl, deer and turkey." Only occasionally, he said, can he persuade Mrs. Clayton to dress and cook the game he

WASHINGTON, Oct. 10 – The Supreme Court agreed today to review the contempt of court convictions of the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and seven other leaders of the desegregation demonstrations in Birmingham, Ala., in 1963.

In its review the Court will be ruling on the legality of the civil rights leaders' defiance of a state court injunction against demonstrations while racial tensions were high in the Alabama city. It will be confronted with a problem posed by Dr. King's "civil disobedience" doctrine.

Dr. King insisted that the injunction against parading without a license was void because it infringed constitutional rights to free speech and assembly.

Moreover, he said his protest movement would lose its momentum if it paused to litigate the injunction.

Citing his belief that "in all good conscience we cannot obey unjust laws," he declared:

"Neither can we obey unjust use of the courts."

He and the other leaders of his Southern Christian Leadership Conference defied the ban and led large marches on Good Friday and Easter. They were sentenced to five days in jail and fines of $50 each.

In response, Birmingham officials cite a series of Supreme Court cases that they said held that a person must obey a court's injunction—even if it is unjust or errouous—and challenge it upon appeal.

To permit each person to decide for himself which injunctions should be obeyed would lead to chaos, the officials contned.

The other convicted men are Wyatt Tee Walker, the Rev. Ralph Abernathy, A. D. King, J. W. Hayes, T. L. Fisher, Fred L. Shuttlesworth and J. T. Porter.

Say Permit Was Refused

The group had inquired about obtaining a parade permit, but was referred to Police Commissioner Eugene Connor, who refused to issue one. Their apppel contends that the law was unconstitutionally vague and was discriminatorily applied.

They also allege that the staet may not punish individuals for dispbeying an order obtained without a hearing that infringes free speech. Further, they contend that the parades were not unlawful.

In its first official actions of the new term, the Supreme Court announced its decisions on more than 500 petitions for review that had stacked up during the summer recess.

In one action it agreed to decide whether Senator James O. Eastland, Democrat of Mississippi, and J. C. Sourwine, counsel for the Senate Internal Security subcommittee, are shielded by legislative immunity from a damage suit growing out of the subcommittee.

Senator Eastland and Mr. Sourwine were each sued for $250,000 by the Southern Conference Educational Fund, Inc., an integrationist group in New Orleans, and its former executive director, James A. Dombrowski.

Police Are Accused

The suit charges that the two defendants conspired with police officials in Louisiana to prevent the educational fund from recovering records and documents that had been illegally seized in a police raid.

According to the suit, Louisiana officials realized that the courts would make them return the records, and Senator Eastland and Mr. Sourwine conspired to subpoena them for the subcommittee and move them to Washington, where the fund has been unable to recover them.

The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia ruled that Senator Eastland and Mr. Sourwine were immune from suit for acts performed under color of their official Senate offices.

The Supreme Court also left in effect a lower court holding that the jury-selection system used in Birmingham and Bessemer, Ala., is not unconstitutional, even though it produces a low percentage of Negroes.

The Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit ruled that there was no evidence of discrimination, and that court officials had tried without success to get Negroes to submit their names for jury duty.

5 NEGROES GUILTY IN ALABAMA TRIAL

Forman and Others Fined for Disorderly Conduct

MONTGOMERY, Ala., Nov. 11—Five civil rights workers, including James Forman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, were convicted today in Montgomery Municipal Court of disorderly conduct. The charge involved incidents that occurred just before the Selma-to-Montgomery march in 1965.

Judge D. Eugene Loe fined the five men $100 each and sentenced them to 30 days in jail, but he suspended the jail sentences on the condition of good behavior.

The five Negroes' attorney, Donald Jelinek of New York, was cited for contempt after the hearing, but he received no sentence.

Mr. Jelinek, attempting to represent the demonstrators, was told that state law required that an out-of-state lawyer be recommended by a member of the Alabama Bar Association before he could practice here.

Negro Lawyer Declines

Judge Loe then summoned a Negro lawyer, Charles Conley, who declined to represent the defendants because he had not been paid for his services by the same group in the past.

"I do not feel that I could represent these people without compensation," Mr. Conley said.

The defendant then attempted to represent their own interests, and the contempt citation against Mr. Jelinek resulted from his persistence in approaching the judge.

One of the defendants, William Hall of Atlanta, cross-examined himself.

Another feature of the hearing was a 90-minute speech by Mr. Forman, who denounced segregation and racial violence in Alabama.

Speech Delays Lunch

The hearing continued for one hour past the normal lunch hour, and Mr. Forman shouted: "My legal experience tells me this is an illegal prosecution."

The city prosecutor, Ira DeMent, retorted: "My legal experience tells me I'm hungry."

Mr. Forman replied: "And I'm hungry for more than just food, Mr. DeMent. I'm hungry for freedom, freedom, freedom." He pounded on the judge's desk for emphasis.

Mr. Forman contended that the group was "at no time profane, violent, indecent or offensive." He asked Judge Loe to "forget the racism which is rampant in this state and look at the facts."

Policemen testified that the five had obstructed traffic and had refused to obey commands to move.

In his ruling, Judge Loe said he would "not tolerate a disturbance of any kind, and on the evidence I find you guilty."

Mr. Jelinek said after the hearing that he expected the convictions to be appealed. The five men were held pending the posting of appeal bond.

The prosecution was delayed for 18 months while the defendants appealed to Federal courts to enjoin the prosecution. A companion case reached the Supreme Court, which declined to hear the appeal.

In addition to Mr. Forman and Mr. Hall, who are both from Atlanta, the defendants were George C. Bass, 20 years old, of Selma; William S. House, 18, of Detroit, and William Ware, 26, of Atlanta.

High Court Backs States In Rights Protest Curbs

COURTS

AC 11/15/66

By BARRY SCHWEID

WASHINGTON (AP)—The Supreme Court Monday significantly limited the freedom of peaceful civil rights demonstrations on government property.

Upholding the trespass conviction of 32 Negroes who demonstrated outside a jail in Tallahassee, Fla., the court said:

"The United States Constitution does not forbid a state to control the use of its own property for its own lawful nondiscriminatory purpose."

The 5-4 decision, written by Justice Hugo L. Black—long a "free speech" advocate—marked the first time the high court after a full review upheld the conviction of civil rights demonstrators.

Justice William O. Douglas, one of the dissenters, protested from the bench: "We now have set into the record a great and wonderful police-state doctrine."

This doctrine, Douglas said, is that police have the power to regulate first amendment rights.

Two other decisions of high import also were handed down by the court.

In one, it left standing a Maryland Court of Appeals ruling that state construction grants to three church-affiliated colleges were unconstitutional.

In the second, it refused to review an Iowa Supreme Court decision giving custody of 8-year-old Mark W. Painter to his grandparents over his father's protests.

Until now, the court has consistently thrown out trespass and breach of peace convictions of civil rights demonstrators. And it has often declared invalid the laws on which the convictions were based.

But in affirming the conviction of Florida A&M students who refused to leave the premises of the county jail in Tallahassee in September 1963 the court said:

"The state, no less than a private owner of property, has power to preserve the property under its control for the use to which it is lawfully dedicated."

The Negro students were protesting segregated facilities at the jail and the previous arrest of other antisegregation demonstrators.

RIGHTS CHARGES

They claimed their arrest under a state trespass law violated several of their constitutional rights, including the first amendment guarantees of free speech and assembly.

The Negroes were convicted by a jury and sentenced to pay a $50 fine each or go to jail for 30 days. In addition, a mandatory 30-day jail sentence was imposed, with a provision that it could be suspended provided they not participate in further demonstrations in Leon County "tending to create racial strife."

Black, writing for the court majority, said:

"Such an agreement has as its major unarticulated premise the assumption that people who want to propagandize protests or views have a constitutional right to do so whenever, and however and wherever they please . . .

OPPOSITE VIEW

"We reject it . . ."

Douglas took a directly opposite view.

He said the students were peacefully exercising the first amendment right to protest, and police officials were being given "the awesome power to decide whose ideas may be expressed and who shall be denied a place to air their claims and petition their government."

Tracing suppression of protests to the days of William Penn, "who preached a nonconformist doctrine in a street in London" in 1670, Douglas wrote:

"In modern times also such arrests were usually sought to be justified by some legitimate function of government.

"Yet by allowing these orderly and civilized protests against injustice to be suppressed, we only increase the forces of frustration which the conditions of second-class citizenship are generating among us."

Justices Tom C. Clark, and John M. Harlan, Potter Stewart and Byron R. White lined up with Black.

Dissenting with Douglas were Chief Justice Earl Warren and Justices William J. Brennan Jr. and Abe Fortas.

Clash of Black and Douglas Suggests Shift of Bench to Conservative Tone

WASHINGTON, Dec. 13—"Our business," Justice Hugo L. Black said yesterday, glancing at his brethren on the Supreme Court, "is not to write laws to fit the day. Our task is to interpret the Constitution."

Such words from a Supreme Court Justice might seem unlikely to invite anger, but they brought a flush to the face of Justice William O. Douglas.

News Analysis

His voice laced with sarcasm, Justice Douglas began to announce his dissent from the opinion Justice Black had just read. In it the Court's four most conservative justices had joined with Justice Black in upholding the right of Georgia's legislature to select the state's next Governor—even if, as it appears likely, the choice will be the Democrat, Lester G. Maddox, who got fewer votes in the general election than the Republican, Representative Howard H. Callaway.

Describing Justice Black's opinion as "a euology to the great and glorious constitutional history of Georgia," Justice Douglas said the same history included" the county unit system, the third degree and sending indigents to jail without benefit of counsel."

Remarks Not in Record

No one present needed to be reminded that Justice Black had led the Court in a series of decisions over the last five years that struck down these and other venerable practices, and worked a major reinterpretation of the meaning—if not the wording—of key provisions of the Constitution.

The remarks of both men were digressions from their prepared texts and will not appear in the tidy columns of the Supreme Court's published opinions.

But they posed a question of substance raised by the Court's recent actions: To what extent does the split between the Court's two senior Justices portend a shift toward conservatism in the actions of the Supreme Court?

The question is underscored by the fact that, in the three significant actions taken thus far in the Supreme Court's young term, Justices Black and Douglas, once the hand and glove of judicial liberalism, were on opposite sides. In each instance Justice Douglas's liberal position was the loser.

The first break came last month, when, in an opinion by Justice Black, the Court approved the first convictions of Negro antisegregation demonstrators since the modern civil rights movement began. Justice Douglas branded the action "a great break with the traditions of the Court."

Split on 3 Cases

Yesterday, in addition to the Georgia case, the Court's two senior Justices found themselves on opposite sides in the appeal of James R. Hoffa, president of the Brotherhood of International Teamsters, and in two other appeals involving the constitutionality of the Government's use of informants and undercover agents.

Justice Black agreed with the majority in each instance that the Government's tactics were proper. Justice Douglas said the practices accepted the philosophy that the ends justify the means.

To courtroom observers, the division between the two Justices appears increasingly to reflect personal pique. And whether or not Justice Douglas's marriage this summer to a 23-year-old woman has, as it is reported here, chilled relations between the two men, the split does seem to run deeper than a monetary disagreement on cases.

Justice Black's majority in both the Negro demonstration appeal and the Georgia case was composed of Justices Tom C. Clark, John M. Harlan, Potter Stewart and Byron R. White—men who were often arrayed on the other side when the Black-Douglas axis was working the constitutional changes alluded to by Justice Douglas yesterday.

But in this term of court, Justice Douglas has found himself dissenting with the men who formed the core of that "liberal" majority—Chief Justice Earl Warren, William J. Brennan Jr. and Abe Fortas.

Slowing of Reform Seen

The immediate reaction among some of the country's most distinguished constitutional lawyers was that Justice Black's realignment signaled at least a slowing of the reformist momentum of the Supreme Court.

Paul A. Freund of the Harvard Law School and Philip B. Kurland of the University of Chicago Law School thought that the Georgia decision did not reflect a reversal, as Justice Fortas said in his dissent, of the Court's one-man, one-vote doctrine.

Both thought that the Supreme Court could proceed to extend the one-man, one-vote principle to local governmental bodies, as it has been asked to do in three appeals yet to be decided, and that this would not be inconsistent with the outcome of the Georgia case.

Professor Freund said in a telephone interview that Justice Black's position on other issues, freedom of speech and criminal procedure, seemed unchanged.

"I don't think Black is changing, " he said, "but there are members of the Court who are trying to move past his position. What he's doing now is blocking that."

Hoffa Ruling Stressed

Professor Kurland calls the Hoffa decision the most important of the term, because it places the Court's stamp of approval on testimony by informers and accomplices, at a time when the Court has been clamping down on interrogation and other methods of obtaining evidence.

He termed the Hoffa case "a retreat" that would encourage the police to make deals, agreeing not to prosecute informants and accomplices in exchange for testmony.

But Prof. Alexander M. Bickel of Yale Law School, who is known for his critical views of the Court's one-man, one-vote doctrine and several other recent decisions, sees the Supreme Court on the verge of a retreat from several of its positions.

"The secret is Black," he said.

He sees the Georgia problem as just one product of the "silly" one-man, one-vote rule, and expects more will return to confront the Court.

"Those chickens," he said, "are coming home to roost."

Professor Freund, at 58 years of age, the dean of America's constitutional law professors, took a mellow view of the role of 80-year-old Justice Black.

"People's ideas are taken up by the oncoming generation and moved forward," he said. "Suddenly the one disowning them is the one who started it all."

Demonstrators' Right to Remove Cases to U.S. Court Is Limited

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, June 20—The Supreme Court limited today the right of arrested civil rights demonstrators to remove their trials from state courts to the Federal courts.

The Court decided two cases involving civil rights advocates arrested by state officers in Georgia and Mississippi. However, the issues involved could affect future demonstrations in the North as well as in the South.

At issue was the legal construction to be placed on the removal law of 1866, which had not been interpreted by the Supreme Court since 1906.

Previously, the Court interpreted the law narrowly to allow a person to remove a state prosecution to the Federal courts only if he contended that he "is denied or cannot enforce" his equal civil rights in the state courts because of a state law that was discriminatory on its face.

Lower Court Overruled

However, in recent months the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, which has jurisdiction over the Deep South states, expanded that interpretation.

It allowed 29 demonstrators arrested in Leflore County, Miss., in the summer of 1964 to remove their cases to the Federal courts. It did this on the strength of their contention that the prosecutions were intended to discourage them from expressing their views. They also contended that they could not get a fair trial at the hands of the Mississippi officials.

In a 5-to-4 decision today, Justice Potter Stewart, speaking for the Supreme Court majority, rejected this interpretation. He reversed the Appeals Court and remanded the cases for trial in the Mississippi courts.

Justice Stewart said that to adopt the petitioners' theory would be "to work a wholesale dislocation of the historic relationships between the state and the Federal courts in the administration of the criminal law."

Such a theory, he said, would allow persons of any race to remove "any charge from a $5 misdemeanor to first-degree murdre" to the Federal courts by alleging that they were being falsely prosecuted because of race, or that they could not get a fair trial in the state courts.

Such a broad removal power would give civil rights activists great leverage in their campaigns, because they could maintain demonstrations despite daily arrests by state officials. The cases could be removed to the Federal courts on a wholesale basis by filing simple forms, but months or years might be required before the Federal judges could get around to hearing the cass.

Justice Stewart pointed out that only 43 criminal cases were removed to Federal courts in the country in 1964. In 1965, after the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit announced its relaxed rule, 1,079 were removed in the South alone.

Such an important change in the law should be made by Congress, not the courts, he said.

View Held in New York

The Stewart, vie wwas followed by Federal judges in New York in 1965, when the Rev. Milton A. Galamison and other civil rights demonstrators were denied the right to remove state breach-of-peace and disorderly conduct cases. In another Northern application of the rule, Negro demonstrators were turned down on their removal attempts in the racial strife in Chester, Pa., in 1964.

Justice Stewart was joined in the majority by Justices Hugo L. Black, Tom C. Clark, John M. Harlan and Byron R. White.

Justice William O. Douglas wrote a dissenting opinion, stating that the removal law had been passed "to afford some protection against local passions and prejudices."

He insisted that a law need not be discriminatory on its face in order to be "used as a club against civil rights workers." Federal judges should be allowed to use their discretion to accept cases on removal when intimidation and harassment are clear, he said.

He was joined by Chief Justice Earl Warren and Justices William J. Brennan Jr. and Abe Fortas.

In the Georgia case, Justice Stewart slightly broadened the classic Supreme Court interpretation to allow removal when htate prosecutions were aimed to punish demonstrators for exercising rights guaranteed by a specific civil rights law.

Georgia Senate to Be Asked For Brutality Investigation

By DAVID NORDAN

State Sen.-elect Jack Stephens said Saturday night that he will ask for a senate committee to investigate alleged brutality at Georgia Industrial Institute at Alto.

The senator from Fulton County's 36th District made the announcement at a press conference called to show a collection of weapons — clubs, chains and rubber hose — that he and Fulton Rep.-elect Cecil Turner discovered during a surprise visit to the institute for youthful offenders Friday.

The weapons, they said, were uncovered after inmates told them where guards allegedly had hidden them.

THE PILE of instruments include 26 clubs, five made of iron, rubber hoses, leather straps, and a string of electrical wire with a steel padlock attached that a guard captain admitted was a deadly weapon.

Supt. Walter Matthews had told the two that the use of clubs by guards was strictly prohibited and that he would fire any man he caught using them.

Mr. Stephens and Mr. Turner said they returned to the prison because some of the inmates told them 10 days ago, during a visit sponsored by the Georgia Committee on Crime and Juvenile Delinquency, that there would be reprisals.

The two uncovered clubs both times after inmates told them where they said guards had stashed them after learning that there would be visitors.

THE TWO SAID a large quantity of the weapons was found in a hole in the ground covered by a canvas which in turn was covered by garbage.

They said the captain accompanying them on the tour expressed surprise that the instruments were being used. He told them, they said that now he was convinced for the first time that such equipment was on the prison grounds.

Both solons said, however, that they were convinced that no such practices of punishment could be conducted without the knowledge and consent of top administration officials at the prison.

Both stated that they found several boys with bruises, lacerations, scars and scabs on their bodies.

They reported that they found three boys, one bearing evidence of a severe beating, being led out of solitary confinement. Mr. Turner and Mr. Stephens had been told during their earlier visit that the "hole" was seldom ever used.

MR. STEPHENS, an assistant administrator of Metropolitan Atlanta Boys' Clubs Inc., said he is concerned and the people of Georgia ought to be concerned about brutality at Alto.

Both men said they were "deeply distressed" at what they found.

"It is difficult for me to conceive of anyone calling Alto a rehabilitation center," Mr. Turner said. "I'm sure that 90 per cent of the boys there will go out hardened against society."

Mr. Turner, an Atlanta attorney, said after talking with the inmates he is convinced that a large percentage of them have no business in the penal institution.

He said he will ask the Georgia Bar Association to conduct an investigation into the cases of each of the 1,050 inmates.

"I talked to several 14- and 15-year-olds who told me they had pled guilty to felonies without ever having seen a lawyer."

Gov. Sanders announced the day after the crime and juvenile deliquency committee visit that a new $1.2 million vocational-education school will be included in a supplemental appropriations bill he will submit to the legislature next month.

IT WAS ANNOUNCED also that increased funds would be appropriated for new living facilities at the institution. Conditions at Alto have been described as "appalling" and "shocking" by crime committee members and other members of the General Assembly.

A Superior Court judge from Clayton County refused to sentence any more prisoners to the institute after a visit there last summer.

Sanders Calls Probe at Alto On Treatment

CRIME + CORRECTIONS

AC 12/13/66

By DAVID NORDAN

Gov. Sanders announced Tuesday he has directed Atty. Gen. Arthur Bolton and the Georgia Bureau of Investigation to conduct an investigation into the treatment of prisoners at Georgia Industrial Institute at Alto.

The governor said at a press conference that he will immediately discharge any correctional officer who has mistreated inmates or any superior officer who has permitted such treatment.

". . . The Sanders administration will neither tolerate nor condone" brutality in any unit of the correction system," the governor declared.

The governor's announcement followed brutality charges by State Rep.-elect Cecil Turner and State Sen.-elect Jack Stephens, both of Fulton County, who said they found evidence that inmates had been mistreated at the North Georgia prison for youthful offenders.

THE TWO displayed a large stock of clubs and weapons which they said they found at Alto during a surprise visit.

The governor asked the two to turn over any evidence they might have to the attorney general. The chief executive coupled his call for the investigation with the announcement that 200 honor inmates will be transferred as soon as possible from Alto to a new honor camp to be created at the State Park at Rutledge, Ga.

He said the proposed honor camp has been under consideration as a facility that could be opened next summer but which will now be opened in early January—"just as quickly as dormitory buildings can be winterized and other necessary arrangements completed."

He said also that there is a possibility that the honor camp inmates may be housed for a time at the Indian Springs State Park near Jackson.

The governor said that he asked the Budget Bureau Tuesday morning to provide $100,000 to winterize the facilities at Rutledge.

IN CALLING for the Alto investigation, Gov. Sanders said he wanted to make it clear that the attorney general "is not going to conduct a witch hunt of any kind or type.

"The officials at Alto include good and honorable men who have been operating under severe handicaps not of their own creation," he said.

"I intend for this investigation to determine beyond any shadow of a doubt the facts about what actually is happenin at Alto.

"Those who are innocent will be cleared of serious charges, and those who are guilty will be rooted out," he said.

The governor termed the situation at Alto as "difficult" and pointed out that two correctional officers have been killed there and two others critically injured.

He said 215 of the 1,050 inmates are there for committing crimes of violence—28 for murder, 34 for manslaughter.

BUT, he concluded, the move to Rutledge will seperate 200 of the honor inmates from some of the more hardened criminals.

Sanders said he has been concerned with the situation at Alto for four years. He pointed out that he recently announced a $1.2 million vocational-technical school will be added at Alto, and that the General Asembly will be asked for a supplemental appropriation of $1.6 million for further improvements at the institution.

These improvements, along with the transfer of a fifth of the inmates, according to Gov. Sanders, could make Alto something of a model institution.

"It takes time to construct new buildings," he said, "but we will not wait one minute in rooting out any vestige of brutality in the operation of any unit of our corrections system."

"I cannot understand those who would carry out such brutality," he said.

Alto has been in the public eye and the subject of much criticism since a citizens committee on crime and juvenile delinquency described conditions there as "dangerous and appalling" last summer.

Mr. Bolton and Corrections Department Director R. H. Burson were with Gov. Sanders at the Tuesday morning press conference.

Reform at Alto at Last?

Incredible charges of brutality toward young inmates of the Georgia Industrial Institute at Alto have moved Gov. Carl Sanders to action that is as welcome as it is overdue.

While he joined the director of his Corrections department in repeating the old alibi that some 200 of the inmates are convicted of violent crime, he added the rather important information that some 200 are honor inmates who ought to be gotten out of the place.

The governor will now expedite the transfer of these honor inmates to an old CCC camp at the state park near Rutledge, Ga., where they can go to work.

Instead of cooping up these young men with the hardened criminals to whom prison officials point as horrible examples, the governor proposes to move them into an environment where they'll have a chance to recover their worth.

The park is the maintenance and repair base for all 43 state parks. With intelligent vocational direction by the Education department, it can be an ideal setting for training the young prisoners for jobs while they work at constructive mechanical jobs.

Gov. Sanders' additional call on the Forestry Commission to provide a nursery-type operation there, and on the Game and Fish Commission to instruct the prisoners in wildlife management, can start Georgia's prison policies toward a time of enlightenment if the intentions are followed through to action.

Twenty states have learned that one of the best ways to rehabilitate prisoners, as well as to stretch budgets in overcrowded prisons, is to get the honor inmates out and put them to work.

Such a work-release program is now going forward in New York City where 10,000 persons—three-fourths of them drug addicts—are jammed into nine prisons. The city's Correction Commissioner, George F. McGrath, proposes to let petty offenders out during the day if they wish to hold regular jobs and return to their cells at night. If they try to escape, they'll be sentenced to an extra year. But if they learn to manage themselves and earn a little money and pride during the closing months of their sentences, McGrath thinks they'll have a more balanced view of society when they are released "instead of coming out of a pressure chamber."

Georgia has had too many bad experiences with private employers exploiting convict labor for us to advocate such a change in this state now.

But certainly there is no reason why public works, such as those Gov. Sanders proposes to put the Alto honor inmates on, should not absorb the energies of thousands of prisoners who could help with the state's work while they gain post-prison experience and the dignity of work for themselves.

SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL
Project on Crime and Penal Administration

Summary of Advisory Committee Meeting

DISCUSSION

The gravity of the nation's current concern about the processes of criminal justice has led to an increasing incidence of overlapping programs of action and research in this area. This factor should be a guiding element as SRC's project is designed. Care should be taken to make the most economical use of the project's resources, especially avoiding duplication of services, in pursuit of a maximum amount of fermentation in the fields that are related to criminal justice. This element of concern was highlighted by committee members' observations that some of the original program suggestions are already underway in other agencies.

Some distinction was indicated between pure research and the kind of purposeful fact-finding and service structured research that SRC sponsors. The high cost of research was acknowledged and, while expediency must be a guiding factor in the project's research program, we can benefit by SRC's experience and ability to obtain an optimum amount of benefit from limited resources.

SURVEY:

A special report on Crime & Corrections in the Southern Region, designed to generate public interest and contribute to public education relative to this social problem, would be useful. It was recommended that the report be expanded to deal more comprehensively with procedures regarding misdemeanants. (Possibly, completion of this report should be delayed until after the publication of the President's Committee's National Survey "in January, 1967."

RESEARCH CONFERENCE

It seemed to be the consensus of the Committee that the proposed conference would not produce results which would justify the time and expense involved. Committee members suggested that such a conference would most likely produce research designs too ambitious to be undertaken by our project. In addition, it was thought that basic research designs by academic people would not have a great deal of relevance for the day-to-day operations of correctional administrators, law enforcement agencies, social welfare workers, and other administrators of criminal justice.

STUDY OF UNDERDEVELOPED CORRECTIONAL SYSTEMS

Some members of the committee felt that a valid study would be difficult, if not impossible, due to the paucity of accurate record keeping in the region's penal systems. It was also felt that the multiplicity of variables would contribute to the problem in terms of time and expense. However, the consensus of the committee, at the end of dis cussion seemed to be that this type of study would have such significant implications for correctional administration that it should be attempted, possibly in collaboration with another agency or university.

COMPARATIVE SENTENCING STUDY

This proposal did not receive intensive coverage, since the project staff was already tentatively committed to undertake it. On the whole, the committee members felt it would be of value.

EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES AND COMMUNITY AID TO PRISONERS

Since only one state in the region has an agency working in the area of prisoner aid, it was felt that such a program would fill a great need.

USE OF CORRECTIONAL SERVICES BY NEGROES

The committee did not consider such a study feasible. It is possible, however, that we could be of assistance to another agency or researcher in finding funds for such a study.

ASSESSMENT OF NORTH CAROLINA PLAN

The committee felt that such a detailed, long-term study would be required that the project could not undertake it in view of resource limitations. Again, we may be able to assist others in finding funds for such a study.

URBAN AREA ACTION AND RESEARCH PROGRAM

The committee felt that such an effort would be extremely valuable in view of the fragmentation of services in urban areas. While such projects have not had a very impressive record of demonstrable success, an action program, carefully related to the needs and values of the community chosen, would be an important contribution. A thorough survey of previous experience in the area of urban delinquency prevention projects would be an essential preliminary step.

WOMEN'S WORK IN PROJECT

The committee felt, with some reservations, that women's groups could make a valuable contribution. The past impact of organized efforts by women in the area of social welfare was recognized and their potential for change-inducing activity was not underrated. Members warned that the women should be advised in advance by a knowledgeable person, and that their activities should be carefully guided to prevent unnecessary development of conflict situations. Also, administrators of agencies to be visited should be involved in advance - to prevent misunderstanding and hostility.

Women were thought to be able to make the greatest contribution in the area of development of community services and resources to provide alternatives to institutionalization for courts and correctional administrators, especially in connection with youthful offenders, the vast majority of whom could be much better served in the community.

Women may also be used as field workers to gather data concerning jails, lock-ups and other short term detention facilities, which often breed crime; such efforts would include the collection of information concerning procedures in relation to misdemeanants.

CORRECTIONAL PROCEDURES AND CRIME CAUSATION

Since this study is already underway, it did not receive discussion.

SUPPORTIVE WORK WITH HUMAN RELATIONS GROUPS

This effort may be dovetailed with the women's groups.

LEGISLATIVE HANDBOOK

Some committee members felt that the presentation of the codes themselves would not have a great deal of impact because of the technical language involved. It was felt that a graphic presentation of principles and summarizing statements would be valuable, especially to community interest groups and the media.

DEVELOPMENT OF MATERIAL PERTAINING TO PUBLIC EDUCATION AND RECRUITMENT IN CORRECTIONS.

The project could make a valuable contribution in this area, particularly in reference to the development of a career consciousness among high school and college students, especially Negroes.

CONSULTATION SERVICE

The committee reacted favorably to the idea of providing a panel of knowledgeable professional correctional workers as resource persons and facilitating the panel's use by correctional systems in the region.

Organizations and groups could secure our support and advice through regional conferences and their own action groups. This program would provide for fees and expenses for consultants and technical advisors.

The project's staff members will also extend themselves, as far as possible, to provide technical advice to correctional systems, law enforcement agencies, and other official bodies concerning correctional procedures, training, and new programs and policies.

CONFERENCE ON THE IMPACT OF RECENT COURT DECISIONS ON LAW ENFORCEMENT AND CORRECTIONAL AGENCIES

There was some disagreementsamong committee members on the value and feasability of the originally proposed conference on racial integration. At least one member felt that such a conference would not reach those whom it was intended to help, since they would be unwilling or unable, for a variety of reasons, to attend. Another member held that correctional administrators were already willing, in most states, to integrate their facilities, but were unable to do so because the final authority was not theirs.

The final consensus of the committee was that such a conference, involving the sharing of experiences, would be useful. It was further felt that the greatest value and widest participation could be guaranteed by broadening the scope of the meeting to include the implications of corrections of recent court decisions in many areas, including health, individual rights, and the possibility of malpractice suits. Experience has shown that these areas are of intense interest to correctional administrators.

CROSS FERTILIZATION THROUGH EMPLOYEE EXCHANGE PROGRAMS

Our proposal will not be implemented. The American Correctional Association has adopted this program.

ADDITIONAL PROPOSALS AND COMMENTS

1. Interstate Corrections Compact. One of the members suggested that a compact permitting the multi-state sharing of correctional facilities, especially for women, would be helpful. The existence and success of the New England compact was alluded to. This type of compact has already been acted into law in at least two southern states (Arkansas and Tennessee), but there does not appear to have been any implementation.

2. Emphasize the positive. It was suggested that a brochure presenting factual information on good treatment or prevention programs already in operation in various southern states would be useful as a public information device. The approach would be - "If this is going on in one southern state, why not in our state?"

3. Conduct briefing programs for state media representatives on conditions in their state's penal system.

4. Examine the effect of current political reaction on the implementation of progressive correctional programs.

5. Pull together and distribute information about state and federal experience in pre-release programs, emphasizing the spontaneous interest of labor and management groups, as well as economic benefits such as family support, taz payments, training, etc.

6. Sponsor or encourage state sentencing instututes for judges, correctional administrators, parole personnel, etc.

7. Explore possibilities of radio interview programs or TV documentaries as effective instruments for public education in correctional problems and programs.

8. Distribute statistical information about mental, social, and personal characteristics of the prison population - in order to modify public attitudes and correct false impressions.

PRELIMINARY REMARKS

Prison authorities are in almost universal agreement concerning certain basic ideas about prisoners and the problems they present. They know that:

First: Prisoners are entitled to humane treatment

Second: Prison workers must make efforts to provide training and rehabilitation so that prisoners will return to the community better prepared to live socially productive lives.

Third: Basic daily practices designed to control the captive population must be modified to the point where they will not seriously contradict the first two goals.

* * * * * * * * * * * * * * * * *

HISTORY OF PRISONS

The not very startling ideas outlined above are relatively new to penology. As recently as 150 years ago, the only widely recognized means for the control of criminal offenders were death, mutilation or banishment. The introduction of the idea of limited terms of confinement as an alternative to these absurdly harsh measures led to the growth of the common prison, the abuses and corruption of which Charles Dickens and other 19th century social reformers so vividly described. The hideous conditions in these prisons - where men, women and children were thrown together without any distinction - led to a reaction which ended in the widespread adoption of solitary confinement both as a means of protecting the individual and preventing group action by prisoners. The ideas outlined at the top of the page are the successors to this theory of isolation.

* * * * * * *

THEORY VS. PRACTICE

The complex history of corrections, described above in only the broadest terms, has resulted in a serious gap between theory and practice. The physical facilities used for the housing of offenders are often massive agglomerations of stone and steel, designed many years ago to accomplish the relatively simple task of physically controlling the prison population at the least possible expense in terms of manpower and material. As a result, the very physical arrangement of an institution often works against the effective use of modern techniques for group treatment and training.

Staff attitudes, especially among older prison personnel, are also at considerable variance with theory. The old correctional journeyman, full of the spurious wisdom that flows from unexamined experience, go about their investigations, their counts, and their record-keeping chores, convinced that innovations are the afflictions of the young, and that their bosses' speeches, full of lofty ideas, are either clever methods for appeasing the sentimental or demonstrations that the leadership is out of touch with reality. For these men, and there are many of them, corrections is a tough, day-by-day job of control, and their hands are full just keeping up with its required processes.

These, and other problems, make the task of prison reform an arduous one, indeed. The points set forth in the following pages are intended to help you, while pursuing this goal, to separate the window dressing from the facts.

* * * * * * * * * * * * * * *

HUMANE TREATMENT

What is humane treatment? The following items are meant to suggest an absolute minimum standard.

1. Three meals a day, providing adequate amounts of well-prepared, wholesome and nourishing food.

2. Housing facilities which are well-heated, lighted and ventilated. They should be designed in a way that will encourage the maintenance of high standards of hygeine and prevention of the spread of disease.

3. Regular job assignments involving productive work. Practices such as the renting out of prison labor to private firms or individuals promote maltreatment.

4. A well-equipped, professionally staffed, hospital and out-patient department. An active program of preventive medicine is also a necessity.

5. Regular changes of clothing suitable to the season. While the requirements of control demand that prisoners' clothing should be in some way distinctive, it should not be of a type which will unnecessarily contribute to a feeling of degradation and humiliation.

6. Discipline is required in order to maintain appropriate order.

    a. Where it is used, it should be carefully administered and recorded according to established rules.

    b. Where administrative isolation is involved, the regulations should require daily visits by a physician as part of the responsibility to protect the health of the inmate, and basic necessities for sustaining that health should be provided.

    c. CORPORAL PUNISHMENT, BRUTALITY IN ANY FORM, OR ANY PRACTICE DESIGNED TO DEGRADE THE INDIVIDUAL, SHOULD BE PROHIBITED.

7. Libraries, self-improvement programs, and other educational activities should be available to all inmates on a regular basis.

8. Suitable facilities for recreation, including space and equipment for both team and individual sports.

9. Other basic necessities, such as toilet articles, provided free for all inmates.

10. A full-time program of religious activities and counseling.

11. Visiting and correspondence privileges. The maintenance and strengthening of family ties through visiting and correspondence should be encouraged, liberal provisions made for family correspondence, and pleasantly decorated, comfortably furnished facilities provided for family visiting. The amount of visiting time should be regulated by:

    a. the capacity of the physical facilities

    b. the need to provide equal time for all inmates

    c. the imperatives of the prison day, such as work schedules and meal times

    d. the availability of supervisory staff.

* * * * * * * * * * * * * * * * * *

TREATMENT AND TRAINING

A vital part of correctional work involves efforts at the social restoration of offenders. Any prison program which does not provide for constructive treatment and training is self-defeating. The following items might serve to outline a minimal program.

1. Every institution needs a professionally staffed classification system which:

   a. differentiates among types of offenders,

   b. identifies individual problems,

   c. establishes treatment and training goals.

   Without such a system, treatment becomes, at best, a hit-and-miss proposition.

2. Facilities and staff for professional casework, counseling, psychotherapy, and other helping processes, are essential. There can be no effective treatment without an adequately trained staff conducting professionally designed programs.

3. An organized education program, including, if possible, an accredited high school, is a basic requirement in any institution. Professionally supervised library facilities, designed to supplement the education program as well as provide for more general reading needs, are an important part of any treatment program.

4. Every institution should have programs designed to provide training in trades and skills. Training programs in skills for which there is no widespread demand in the labor market cannot be considered productive. For example, a program built around an operation for the manufacture of automobile license tags is not useful vocational training.

* * * * * * * * * * * * * * * * * * * *

VISITORS' PROGRAM

Some selective process should be used in recruiting visitors. Personal appearance and demeanor are important. Those willing to participate should:

1. Conduct themselves in a polite, well-mannered way

2. Be willing to pay close attention to remarks and explanations by institution staff and record what they hear and see.

3. Not engage in conversation with an inmate without permission of a staff member.

4. Act like a fair-minded person.

* * * * * * *

It would be wise for visitors to work in teams of no more than six. Such a number would provide a sufficient variety of impressions without placing an undue burden upon the staff of the institution.

* * * * * * *

When visiting a prison, the following should be kept in mind:

1. The prison day is highly organized and easily disrupted. For this reason, prison officials are hesitant to permit outside groups to be present during periods of mass movement, such as meal times and work calls. Allowance will have to be made for this factor.

2. Few visitors are likely to have had any experience which would prepare them for the initial impact of the prison community. Thus, careful advance reading of the material provided will enable visitors better to understand and evaluate what they see.

3. Prison officials, not without reason, tend to be somewhat defensive. Therefore, questioners who display a hostile or unduly critical attitude have little chance of receiving complete or honest answers.

4. In the unlikely event that an inmate should make an unseemly remark, it should simply be ignored. Complaints or displays of indignation or moral outrage would only make prison officials reluctant to permit future visits.

BANK STREET COLLEGE OF EDUCATION

Founded in 1916 as the Bureau of Educational Experiments, Bank Street College of Education is a center for research and advanced study in early childhood and elementary education. The College is a fully accredited, co-educational, non-profit institution. It conducts six ongoing programs:

Graduate Programs in Education: A graduate school for teachers, supervisors, and guidance personnel offers 5th and 6th year programs preparatory to work with children from preschool through elementary and intermediate grades. A counselor education program prepares guidance personnel for early childhood, elementary, and secondary levels.

Laboratory schools for children: 1) The Bank Street School for Children has experimental programs for three-year-olds and all grades through grade 7. 2) A day-care center provides a learning program for preschool children in a disadvantaged neighborhood. 3) A multi-purpose child development center offers education to preschool children and counseling to their parents.

Educational Resources Center: A center for curriculum development, innovation, and demonstration helps 23 public schools in Harlem to bring about positive change. The ERC is the outgrowth of 20 years of field services in cooperation with the New York City system.

Curriculum Consultation Service: A national service brings information about innovative developments in curriculum and administration to integrating schools.

Research: Current programs supported by government agencies and foundation grants are concerned with the learning process and the role of the school as a factor in personality development.

Publications: The publications staff is completing a basal series of primary readers reflecting multi-cultural urban life, published by The Macmillan Company.

Meredith Resumes March On Eve of Rally in Jackson

By GENE ROBERTS

Special to The New York Times

TOUGALOO, Miss., June 25—James Meredith, the Negro who started the civil rights march through Mississippi, took over its leadersip again today after a dispute that clouded preparations for tomorrow's entry into Jackson.

Angry that marchers had hiked to Tougaloo College, on the outskirts of Jackson, without him yesterday, Mr. Meredith unexpectedly returned to Canton 20 miles away and retraced the marchers steps.

The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and other marchers joined Mr. Meredith's march late today in a show of harmony that made Mr. Meredith the march leader and smoothed over the controversy.

The dispute developed, Dr. King said, because of a 'breakdown in communications."

"There will be only one march tomorrow," Mr. Meredith said in agreement.

Predict Large Turnout

Both predicted that thousands would join in tomorrow for the last eight-mile leg of the long journey that Dr. King and other civil rights leaders carried on after Mr. Meredith was wounded June 6, on the second day of his projected march to spur Negro voter registration.

Today was the first time Mr. Meredith had marched since he was shot. He rode in a car the last two miles on the advice of doctors who accompanied him.

Stokely Carmichael, chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, and 500 other marchers carried on the walk from Canton to Tougaloo College. They were met near the campus by Dr. King and 500 others, who walked out to welcome him in a show of harmony.

Mr. Meredith said he had undertaken today's walk because he had promised friends that he would "do some walking with them." Counting Mr. Meredith's marchers, more than 1,500 persons were camping at Tougaloo College for Negroes, the staging area for tomorrow's march to the State Capitol in Jackson.

Joseph Colucci, a chemist from Columbus, Ohio, flew in for the march. Eugene Jones, a 22-year-old Negro who mows lawns for a living in Hattiesburg, Miss., "hitched" a ride to the campus with friends. And dozens of Negroes flocked to the campus on battered busses that they had borrowed from churches and Negro fraternal organizations.

John Lewis, the former chairman of the Student Committee, was here, as was James Forman, who until recently was the Student Committee's executive director. Wyatt Tee Walker, who once was one of Dr. King's top aides, strolled through the campus saying "hello" to veteran civil rights workers that he said he had not seen "for years."

Pennants and Buttons

Girls milled about selling march pennants for $1 and march buttons at prices ranging from 25 cents to $1.50.

Student Committee workers, who have adopted a black panther as the symbol of their Negro political movement in the South, distributed bumper stickers bearing a picture of a lunging panther and the legend, "We're the Greatest."

Many of the marchers who kept the march column going along the circuitous, 260-mile route to Jackson were not around for the finale.

A middle-aged couple who drove to the march from California became engaged and were married in Memphis. They spent their honeymoon on the march and then had to rush back to their jobs in San Francisco.

They were two among many who filtered in and out of the marching column during the long journey. No one here said that he had marched every step of the way from the shaded roadside where Mr. Meredith was wounded.

"On the whole, the march has been a good thing," said Assistant Attorney General John Doar, chief of the civil rights division of the Justice Department.

He said the march has encouraged "many Mississippi Negroes to take a step toward independent, political assertiveness for the first time in their lives."

"If the people [civil rights marchers] continue to work, they will have had a remarkable effect on the lives of the Negroes of Mississippi," he went on. "The important thing is not statistics—the number of Federal voting examiners—but real participation by the citizen in the political life of his community."

One of the many goals of the Rights March Makes an Impact—In Some Places

By ROY REED

Special to The New York Times

JACKSON, Miss., June 25—A Negro civil rights worker spent a night in jail this week in a Mississippi town that had been visited by the rights protest march a few days earlier.

He reported later that the jailer had had to dissuade two white men from beating him in his cell during the night.

"These niggers will get you in a lot of trouble," the jailer told the men.

The jailer's attitude was one of many signs of the impact of the march through Mississippi.

In some communities on the march route, the event apparently left little more than a vague awareness that some restless spirit had been in the land. In others, the march may be remembered as the beginning of a real change in the life of the Negro.

The reaction to the march elsewhere in the nation has been mixed.

Capital Interest Ebbs

Interest among Washington officials has noticeably declined in recent days. President Johnson and members of Congress have remained relatively quiet about the march since an outburst of anger when James H. Meredith, who started the march, was shot June 6.

The shooting incident increased the pressure for the passage of the Administration's civil rights bill that would, among other things, make it easier to prosecute instigators of violence against Negroes and rights workers.

Rights groups have continued their demands for a more active Federal role in protecting Negroes and rights workers.

In the South, the white majority has merely tolerated the rights spectacle in Mississippi. White officials have expressed sympathy for their colleagues in Jackson and newspapers have editorially expressed exasperation and disgust.

The Associated Press Bureau in Birmingham, Ala., was asked by a member radio station to check a report that Mr. Meredith had been shot by a member of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Town May Be Altered

Grenada, at the eastern edge of the Mississippi River Delta, is a town that may be significantly altered by the march.

About 20 civil rights workers, many of them affiliated with the Southern Christian Leadership Conference and the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, stayed in Grenada after the march passed through June 16.

In a week, they had aroused enough local interest to form an organization called the Grenada County Movement. About 200 persons attended the organizing meeting last Monday night.

It was clear before the week was over that the march had merely struck the first spark in Grenada. The real work lay ahead.

City and county officials had bent over backward when the marchers went through town.

Obviously hoping to appease them and speed them on their way, the officials had hired six Negro voter registrars, opened the registration office at night, desegregated the courthouse restrooms, provided police protection through the city and did nothing when the marchers "desecrated" the Confederate monument by planting an American flag on it.

Once the marchers had left and headed south, Grenada began to return to normal. The Negro registrars were dismissed—having been hired only temporarily, the officials explained—and Negroes were asked to stay away from the registrar's office for three weeks to give the clerks a chance to catch up on paper work.

Most public facilities in the city remained as segregated as ever.

The Grenada County Movement took its first step Thursday night when Negro youths and civil rights workers tried unsuccessfully to desegregate the Grenada Theater. They sat on the floor of the lobby when they found the ticket office closed, and the police jailed 17 of them.

The Rev. Sharper T. Cunningham, pastor of the Belle Flower Baptist Church who is the temporary chairman of the movement, said the new organization was drafting a list of grievances to present to city officials and was digging in for a concerted campaign.

Response Was Expected

"We felt that the power structure would renege once the marchers had gone," he said, "and it has."

In other communities along the route, the marchers left only a faint scratch.

They passed through the only street of Louise, Miss., Tuesday morning.

The town's only eating place, the Louise Cafe, carried a bold but poorly spelled designation of its segregated entrances—"White" over one door and "Clored" over the other.

The signs had not even come down in deference to the march.

Hura L. Montgomery, a 69-year-old Negro on whose property outside Louise the marchers spent Monday night, pondered the impact of the march four days after it had left.

"I would guess that as many as 50 per cent of the people [Negroes] will not be affected at all by it," he said. "This percentage is going to have to die and pass on before we see any real change."

Yet, a few Negroes have been stirred to register to vote, Mr. Montgomery said. Louise may never be quite the same again, he said, because that small response is only a beginning.

The reaction of Mississippi whites to the march has generally ranged from scorn to outrage. A few moderates had begun to emerge before the march, but they have remained silent during the last three weeks.

More Harm Than Good

Sheriff Albert C. Blair of Tate County in northern Mississippi said the march had had no good effect in his county among Negroes or whites. It probably caused more harm than good, he said, by antagonizing whites and making it more difficult for Negroes to get along with them.

James McRae Criss of Grenada, prosecuting attorney for Grenada County, conceded that the march had caused a spurt of interest in voter registration among Grenada Negroes.

As for the general effect of the march, he said:

"I expect the militant whites and the militant colored are more militant than they were before. But for the normal person, it has had no effect.

"It's kind of like a carnival coming to town. People want to see what's going on. But after it's gone, nothing much has changed."

Jackson Girds for Capitol Rally; Marchers to Reach City Today

By MARTIN WALDRON

Special to The New York Times

JACKSON, Miss., June 25—Several hundred city, state and county policemen were mobilized today in preparation for a rally on the Capitol grounds tomorrow by several thousand civil rights demonstrators.

Gov. Paul B. Johnson Jr. was reported to be handling the details himself to a large extent.

There was no firm decision made today as to whether the demonstrators, ending three weeks of sometimes violent civil rights activity, would be allowed to use the Capitol steps as a podium.

However, leaders of the demonstrations continued to announce that speeches would be made from that position.

Yesterday, workmen put up a fence around the Capitol but they came back last night to tear it down, and there was a ciation for the Advancement of Colored People, was murdered from ambush here in 1963—the city appeared to take the advice of the Governor and Mayor.

Absolute calm prevailed in the city today.

There was more concern expressed over Mississippi's new liquor laws than over tomorrow's march. Private clubs and restaurants have agreed to stop bootlegging liquor until an election in August.

Many bootleggers have almost run out of stock as they have offered cut-price sales to beat the deadline to stop illegal sales on July 1.

Highways were crowded with automobiles today as fishermen and waterskiers hauled their boats to the lake north of Jackson for a weekend.

Almost every hotel and motel in Jackson was full as several

TORNADOES AND RAIN STRIKE THE MIDWEST

CHICAGO, June 25 (AP)—Storms that blended smashing winds and pounding rains moved across the top of the Midwest today.

A series of tornadoes, rain and hail struck at North Dakota last night and early today, toppling some buildings, peeling off roofs, dealing heavy damage to crops and setting off floods.

Mike Uhrich, 10 years old, was killed when a twister destroyed a barn on his family's farm between Langdon and Valhalla, N. D.

More than 50 persons were evacuated from their homes in Center, N. D. The town was flooded by six inches of rainfall that poured down in an hour.

A heavy downpour forced everybody in Almont, N. D., a hamlet of about 200 persons, to head for higher ground.

A tornado knocked a roof off a home for the aged at McClusky, N. D. Several other buildings took such a battering that bulldozers were used to clear the streets.

Farmers in that area reported heavy hail damage to crops.

High winds felled the transmitter tower of radio station KFNW and broke plate glass windows in business buildings in Fargo, N. D.

Fee Asked for Police Escort

Special to The New York Times

WESTFIELD, N. J., June 25—Merchants here would have to pay a $5 fee for police to escort them to the bank with their receipts, according to an ordinance introduced this week by the Town Council. For years many merchants have called for a patrol car when they want to transport the day's receipts to the bank. A public hearing on the measure will be held Tuesday.

A middle-aged couple who drove to the march from California became engaged and were married in Memphis. They spent their honeymoon on the march and then had to rush back to their jobs in San Francisco.

They were two among many who filtered in and out of the marching column during the long journey. No one here said that he had marched every step of the way from the shaded roadside where Mr. Meredith was wounded.

"On the whole, the march has been a good thing," said Assistant Attorney General John Doar, chief of the civil rights division of the Justice Department.

He said the march has encouraged "many Mississippi Negroes to take a step toward independent, political assertiveness for the first time in their lives."

"If the people [civil rights marchers] continue to work, they will have had a remarkable effect on the lives of the Negroes of Mississippi," he went on. "The important thing is not statistics—the number of Federal voting examiners—but real participation by the citizen in the political life of his community."

One of the many goals of the marchers was to force the Justice Department to send Federal registrars into 600 Southern counties.

They have not succeeded in this. But they have succeeded in registering 3,000 to 4,000 Negroes and persuading more than 10,000 to join at least briefly in the march.

The shooting of Mr. Meredith brought civil rights activists scurrying to Mississippi to pick up the march. Mr. Doar has traveled ahead of the columns, working with state and local law enforcement agencies to provide local protection for the marchers.

While he has remained aloof from the march itself, he said today that he had observed the marching column often enough to be impressed by the number of Mississippi Negroes who joined the out-of-state marchers.

During his 20-mile march today, Mr. Meredith denied that he had any quarrel with the civil rights leaders who took over his march while he convalesced at his home in New York.

He also said that he had not returned to Mississippi with firearms. While convalescing, he had said that he would never appear in the state publicly again without a gun.

"I'm not armed," he said, "because the Mississippi highway patrol chief has accepted all responsibility for security. He has given me his word."

Meanwhile, at Tougaloo, tomorrow's entry into Jackson was being planned by Dr. King, head of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Floyd McKissick, national director of the Congress of Racial Equality; and representatives of the National Urban League, the Mississippi branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Freedom Democratic party, the Delta Ministry of the National Council of Churches and the Lawyers' Constitutional Defense Committee of the American Civil Liberties Union.

Although CORE, the Student Committee, the Delta Ministry and the Southern Leadership Conference picked up the march immediately after Mr. Meredith was wounded, other organizations joined later.

The alliance became strained at several points along the marching route as a result of disputes over defensive violence vs. nonviolence as a civil rights technique and over "black power" vs. "freedom now" as the battle cry of the civil rights movement. But it appeared today that the organizations would continue to work together for the remaining day of the march.

Most civil rights leaders were predicting that the march into Jackson would swell to 20,000 to 30,000 marchers tomorrow, but most agreed privately that it was too early to tell.

The marchers, with the exception of those with Mr. Meredith, spent the day resting and trying to persuade local Negro ministers to lead their congregations in tomorrow's march.

Jackson Girds for Capitol Rally; Marchers to Reach City Today

By MARTIN WALDRON

Special to The New York Times

JACKSON, Miss., June 25—Several hundred city, state and county policemen were mobilized today in preparation for a rally on the Capitol grounds tomorrow by several thousand civil rights demonstrators.

Gov. Paul B. Johnson Jr. was reported to be handling the details himself to a large extent.

There was no firm decision made today as to whether the demonstrators, ending three weeks of sometimes violent civil rights activity, would be allowed to use the Capitol steps as a podium.

However, leaders of the demonstrations continued to announce that speeches would be made from that position.

Yesterday, workmen put up a fence around the Capitol but they came back last night to tear it down, and there was a report that Governor Johnson would allow the mass gathering on the Capitol grounds.

At the same time, however, the Governor issued a formal statement that "all" laws in Mississippi would be enforced. A 1965 law prohibits the use of the Capitol and its grounds for demonstrations and parades.

Normal Activity Urged

Governor Johnson has State Park and Wildlife officers on duty as well as the State Highway Patrol. And Mayor Allen Thompson of Jackson said the situation would be kept under control. Mayor Thompson asked citizens of Jackson to stay away from the mass gathering tomorrow, and to go about their normal weekend activities.

The Mayor would not say what plans the city had to cope with the crowd, but it was reported that he had agreed to let the state take charge of keeping the peace.

"Peace will be preserved and order will prevail in Mississippi," Governor Johnson said.

He warned that anyone creating a disturbance would be arrested and prosecuted. "Breaches of the peace, violence and civil disorder must be suppressed and punished to the fullest extent of the law," the Governor said.

He congratulated Mississippi for accepting the demonstrations with "patience and forebearance" and said this weekend should see the end of "weeks of provocation."

Although Jackson has been the scene of numerous racial incidents in the last five years—Medgar Evers, head of the state chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, was murdered from ambush here in 1963—the city appeared to take the advice of the Governor and Mayor.

Absolute calm prevailed in the city today.

There was more concern expressed over Mississippi's new liquor laws than over tomorrow's march. Private clubs and restaurants have agreed to stop bootlegging liquor until an election in August.

Many bootleggers have almost run out of stock as they have offered cut-price sales to beat the deadline to stop illegal sales on July 1.

Highways were crowded with automobiles today as fishermen and waterskiers hauled their boats to the lake north of Jackson for a weekend.

Almost every hotel and motel in Jackson was full as several conventions got underway. The largest, a state meeting of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, was expected to attract 2,500 white veterans from over the state to the capital this weekend.

A conservative group, the Constitution party, tried to organize a rally in behalf of states rights and against Federal civil rights laws last night, but created almost no stir. The group, headed by Texans, got no mention in the local papers.

Both of Jackson's daily newspapers—The News and The Clarion Ledger—urged the 175,000 residents of Jackson to ignore the "unwanted visitors" tomorrow.

The demonstrators, The Clarion Ledger said in a front-page editorial today, want "to create a series of incidents which they hope can be blown into a full scale eruption of violence."

On the theory that the rally will be allowed to go ahead on the steps of the Capitol, television networks were bringing in equipment to televise the gathering scheduled, which is scheduled to begin at 6 P.M.

Most of the civil rights clashes in Mississippi have taken place in small farming center towns, and the Highway Patrol was under instructions to watch for the possibility that groups from those areas might drive into Jackson today and tomorrow to attack demonstrators.

The marchers are scheduled to depart from Tougaloo Southern Christian College eight miles north of downtown Jackson early tomorrow morning and wind their way through business and residential sections to the Capitol.

TORNADOES AND RAIN STRIKE THE MIDWEST

CHICAGO, June 25 (AP)—Storms that blended smashing winds and pounding rains moved across the top of the Midwest today.

A series of tornadoes, rain and hail struck at North Dakota last night and early today, toppling some buildings, peeling off roofs, dealing heavy damage to crops and setting off floods.

Mike Uhrich, 10 years old, was killed when a twister destroyed a barn on his family's farm between Langdon and Valhalla, N. D.

More than 50 persons were evacuated from their homes in Center, N. D. The town was flooded by six inches of rainfall that poured down in an hour.

A heavy downpour forced everybody in Almont, N. D., a hamlet of about 200 persons, to head for higher ground.

A tornado knocked a roof off a home for the aged at McClusky, N. D. Several other buildings took such a battering that bulldozers were used to clear the streets.

Farmers in that area reported heavy hail damage to crops.

High winds felled the transmitter tower of radio station KFNW and broke plate glass windows in business buildings in Fargo, N. D.

Fee Asked for Police Escort

Special to The New York Times

WESTFIELD, N. J., June 25—Merchants here would have to pay a $5 fee for police to escort them to the bank with their receipts, according to an ordinance introduced this week by the Town Council. For years many merchants have called for a patrol car when they want to transport the day's receipts to the bank. A public hearing on the measure will be held Tuesday.

GOLDWATER ASSAILS JOHNSON ON RIGHTS

WASHINGTON, June 25 (UPI)—Barry Goldwater said today that he agreed with statements by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. that the Federal Government was not fully enforcing the civil rights laws.

Mr. Goldwater made the statement in a pre-taped television interview with William F. Buckley Jr. for the "firing line" program distributed by R.K.O. General Productions.

The 1964 Republican Presidential candidate accused President Johnson of "walking a tightrope" in the fields of civil rights enforcement and in the war in Vietnam.

"Now we have some Americans who say let's not push these integration laws. We have other Americans who say let's push them," Mr. Goldwater said.

The former Senator said the President "is trying to stay in the middle, like he's staying in the middle with the doves and the hawks on what I call the chicken line."

Mr. Goldwater, who voted against the Civil Rights Act of 1964 on grounds that he found two sections "unconstitutional," said "we have plenty of laws on the books to take care of violators of integration or segregation, whichever way you approach it.

"But is the Attorney General really using the muscle he has to stop the attacks on Negroes every place in this country? And I have to say, no, that they're not," he continued.

Jersey Man Is Arrested In Stabbing of a Trooper

STANHOPE, N. J., June 25 (AP)—A 31-year-old kitchen worker was charged with stabbing a state trooper and trying to stab another today when the troopers broke up a fight between him and two other men.

The wounded trooper, Girbert Pagano, 40, a 12-year veteran stationed at the Netcong barracks, was reported in good condition at Dover General Hospital. The authorities said he was stabbed in the chest with a five-inch paring knife.

Trooper Jon Mendres, who was with trooper Pagano, was not hurt.

The suspect, Elias Jinenez Vega of Mine Hill, was arraigned in Byram Township Municipal Court on charges of atrocious assault and battery on the trooper and attempted assault and battery on trooper Mendres.

RIGHTS MARCHERS' CARS BURNED IN CHICAGO: Five cars burning on the Southwest Side on Sunday, after being set afire by whites. Rights marchers, both Negro and white, drove to the area, parked, and marched to protest discrimination in a community of private homes. Residents chased marchers. Twelve whites were arrested.

Dr. King Calls Chicago Police Lax in March Duty

CHICAGO, Aug. 1 (UPI)—The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. accused the Chicago police today of laxity in their efforts to protect civil rights demonstrators from whites who hurled rocks and bottles at them on the weekend.

The whites, he said, had caused more property damage than had Negroes in the recent racial disturbances here.

"We are seriously disturbed by the failure of the Chicago Police Department to protect the peaceful civil rights demonstrators on Chicago's Southwest Side," Dr. King said in a statement from Atlanta.

Joining him in the statement was Albert A. Raby, a civil rights leader, who led the marches through the Gage Park area. About 30 persons were injured, and a dozen cars owned by the marchers were burned.

The statement said:

"It is clear that the police were either unwilling or unable to disperse the riotous mob that so brutally attacked Negroes and whites who had come to the community to seek open housing in compliance with the law.

"The failure to exercise full responsibility for full protection is especially apalling [since] huge masses of police and National Guardsmen were mobilized to put down the violence of a few hundred Negroes on the West Side.

"At the height of the violence on the West Side not more than a few cars were burned. It is clear that this bigoted mob destroyed more property on the Southwest side than did the West Side rioters.

"We shall continue to demonstrate in every all-white community in Chicago in our nonviolent effort to open housing for all men. In the process, we demand the full and active protection of the local police."

Police Superintendent Orlando W. Wilson declined to comment on the statement. A police spokesman referred calls to the city's Commission on Human Relations. A spokesman there said, "There's nothing we can say, it's a police matter."

Mr. Raby said the marches would continue for "two weeks or two years, as long as they are necessary."

"We're going to stand in the shadow of the church in order to associate our cause with the moral leadership of the community. We will not be diverted by turning our anger against the police or the misguided people who attacked us," he said.

The march was sponsored by the Coordinating Council of Community Organization, a civil rights group closely allied with the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

Twenty-five persons were arrested in the two days of violence at Gage Park. On Sunday night, besides the dozen cars that were overturned and burned, the windows of 23 other autos were smashed and their tires slashed. Two cars were pushed into a lagoon at Marquette Park.

The 500 demonstrators were bitter about the damage to the cars. The autos, easily identified by windshield stickers reading, "Union to end Slums," had been left at the park at the request of the police, the demonstrators said. They said officers had promised to guard the vehicles.

The leaders of the march praised the marchers for continuing their protest during the barrage of bottles and bricks.

"This was their first real test. They displayed perfect non violent discipline," a spokesman said.

However, Robert Lucas, a local leader of the Congress of Racial Equality, said, "We can't continue the passive reaction to all hatred."

The marchers said the white crowd had followed them east along 71st Street from California Avenue 1½ miles to Ashland Avenue, the west border of "Bronzeville," the South Side Negro area. There the white crowd turned back.

"Nothing can more dramatically illustrate the rigid color line in housing," a demonstrator said.

Twenty-four adults and seven juveniles were arrested.

Edward J. Byrd, 18 years old, was shot in the stomach with a pellet from a police shotgun. Officers said they had surprised him and three other youths looting a liquor store. The wounded youth was in satisfactory condition in a hospital.

During the July 4th weekend, the National Guard had joined the police in quelling young Negroes on the North Side.

The area was quiet until early yesterday, when there was vandalism and looting. The trouble today was far more widespread.

The police said that the latest outburst showed planning.

"Anytime you've got Molotov cocktails ready, you have got some planning," the Mayor said.

The police said they had heard rumors for a week of an outbreak this weekend.

Mayor Sorensen said many Negroes had told him of resentment that resulted when a young Negro was shot and killed by the police last Monday after a burglary.

"This is no reason to go around burning down buildings," he commented.

Public Safety Director Francis E. Lynch said police shifts with extra police would patrol the area.

New Omaha Violence

OMAHA, Aug. 1 (AP) — Mayor A. V. Sorensen, visibly shaken by fresh violence on Omaha's North Side, tramped through burned and looted business places today and said, "We're not going to tolerate any more of this."

Fires, looting and vandalism broke out in the heavily Negro area early today, and in at least two instances occurred well beyond its confines.

Molotov cocktails — gasoline-filled bottles with rags for wicks — started fires in three businesses in the Negro area. Another blackened the window of a downtown fur shop two miles from the Negro district.

Police fired riot guns in the air and dispersed a crowd of at least 150 persons after a patrol car was stoned.

Atlanta Police Disperse Negroes Protesting S.N.C.C. Aide Arrest

By ROY REED

Special to The New York Times

ATLANTA, Aug. 3—A noisy crowd of several dozen Negroes gathered to protest the arrest of a civil rights worker on a traffic charge yesterday afternoon in a Negro section of Atlanta.

Stokely Carmichael, chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, joined the crowd and led chants of "black power" before extra policemen were called to disperse the angry Negroes.

A bystander reported that Mr. Carmichael told some of his followers after the police left that the police had been afraid to make arrests because the Negroes had stuck together. Mr. Carmichael was not available for comment.

Mr. Carmichael avoided reporters today. Beyond a sketchy statement issued by his office, he left all explanations to lesser staffworkers, who said they knew nothing.

Patrolman B. C. Basham, a white motorcycle officer, reported that he had stopped a car carrying three Negro men after he saw the car block an intersection and make an illegal left turn in the Atlanta University neighborhood.

The driver was Samuel B. Schutz, 21 years old, an Alabama field secretary for the student committee. Mr. Schutz is one of the organization's most militant workers. He led demonstrations against white authorities at Tuskegee, Ala., last year after a Negro student had been killed by a white man there.

Driver Called a Crowd

Patrolman Basham's report said, "The driver and occupants of the vehicle began to call a crowd together, creating a disturbance. At this time, after asking the subjects to cease the commotion, I attempted to issue the citation for disorderly conduct-disturbance."

A woman in the crowd took Mr. Schutz's copies of the three citations—for making an illegal turn, blocking an intersection and disorderly conduct — and tore them up.

Several in the crowd shouted hostile remarks at the officer.

Patrolman Watson Holley Jr., a Negro officer, arrived and members of the crowd asked him why he was helping white officers.

"Where is your heart?" one Negro shouted at Patrolman Holley.

At least three carloads of policemen were sent to break up the disturbance, a police spokesman said.

Patrolman Basham was carried to safety in a patrol car.

Mr. Carmichael issued a statement through the student committee's communications office here today saying that after Mr. Schutz and his companions had been threatened with arrest, "black people from the community, long harassed and brutalized by the Atlanta police, began to gather, challenging the validity of this arrest."

"As one man standing on the corner said, 'we have to help the brother,'" the statement said. "In a typical reaction of fear against any sign of strength in the black community, overwhelming police force was called for."

Arson in Omaha

OMAHA, Aug. 3 (UPI) — A fire set by an arsonist caused an explosion that demolished a cafe and damaged an adjacent service station and three cars near Omaha's racially disturbed near North Side early today. Five persons were injured.

"It was of incendiary nature," said Joseph Pluta, a fire investigator.

The cafe, owned by Harold Brown of Omaha, had not been open for business recently.

The injured suffered cuts from flying glass from the explosion, which occurred at about 2:25 A.M.

Three of the injured were in a passing car, and the other two were in a nearby house. All were treated at a hospital and released.

The service station next to the cafe was extensively damaged. Also damaged were two homes in the immediate vicinity.

Rocks Thrown at Police

PROVIDENCE, R.I., Aug. 3 (AP)—The police were showered with rocks and bottles again last night as they quelled disturbances in a predominantly Negro section for the second straight night.

The disturbances came after a rally by about 1,000 Negroes Monday night when civil rights lealers protested alleged de facto segregation in city schools.

But the rights leaders said today that the disturbances were unrelated to their protests.

"We remain dedicated to nonviolence," said James D. McDaniel Jr., chairman of the Negro Leadership Conference in Providence, which had sponsored the rally.

Gov. John H. Chafee also said Monday's disturbance had no relation to the civil rights rally.

Trouble in Minneapolis

MINNEAPOLIS, Aug. 3 (AP)—A gang of Negro youths smashed three stores today in a brief early-morning spree in a northside predominantly Negro neighborhood.

The police said there were no injuries, three arrests, about 25 business windows broken and no racial overtones.

Police Inspector Donald R. Dwyer said at most 50 teenagers were involved in the actual looting, while a crowd of 200 watched.

3,000 Chicago Whites Jeer King's Drive

CHICAGO (UPI) — Nearly 3,000 whites jeered members of Dr. Martin Luther King's Chicago civil rights drive during protests of alleged housing discrimination Wednesday. Hundreds more tried to block the demonstrators path as they left the Northwest Side area.

Seventeen men, one woman and two juveniles were arrested in the Belmont-Cragin area, bringing the two-day total to 24.

A white man shouted obscenities and lunged at two Negro policemen. He was clubbed to the pavement and whished away by police. Another man attacked a white officer. He was kicked in the stomach and arrested.

Whites hurled bricks at praying demonstrators. The missiles narrowly missed their targets.

White teen-agers set a grass fire in a park where demonstrators parked their cars. Others attempted to prevent the demonstrators from reaching the parking lot.

"I'm not getting off the sidewalk for any niggers," they shouted.

Police in riot helmets used night sticks to fight their way through the white persons blocking the streets and sidewalks along the line of march from the Parker & Finney Inc. real estate agency to Hanson Park, where demonstrators had left their cars.

The crowd's anger turned on the police. "How many niggers have you got locked up, copper?," they shouted.

When demonstrators arrived for the second successive protest outside the Parker & Finney office on Fullerton Avenue, white residents of the predominantly Polish and Italian Belmont-Cragin neighborhood massed on the opposite side of the street.

As the 350 demonstrators, marching from the scene of smaller protests against alleged housing discrimination at real estate offices four blocks farther north, reached Parker & Finney, the shouting and jeering began.

Meanwhile, in Minneapolis, Minn., Gov. Karl F. Rolvaag and Mayor Arthur Naftalin promised jobs to a shouting crowd of 300 Negroes in a city park Wednesday night in an effort to avoid any resumption of smashing and looting on the city's North Side.

Rolvaag told the crowd, mostly teenagers, he had obtained commitments from businessmen in conferences during the day to offer 60 jobs to Negroes.

One Negro youth shouted he didn't believe the governor and there were shouts of "burn, burn," a threat to use firebombs. But a Negro Baptist minister, the Rev. Stanley King, appealed to the teenagers to try for the jobs before turning to more violence.

"See if the promises are true," he said. "If they aren't then burn tomorrow night."

The governor and mayor held the park meeting with Negroes after meeting for several hours earlier in the day with police officers, Negro ministers and other officials.

Negro teenagers smashed windows of about 25 stores and looted some of them early Wednesday.

King Is Hit By a Rock In Chicago

AC 8/6/66

CHICAGO (AP)—Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. was struck on the head by a rock and a white youth was wounded by a knife thrown at King Friday as rioting broke out in an all-white neighborhood on Chicago's Southwest Side.

King, who was not seriously injured by the rock, said after the rioting had subsided that he had never seen such hate and that the group would return at a later date to the area.

After the 800 demonstrators left the park, more than 5,000 white residents of Chicago Lawn — a neat, middle-class neighborhood 7½ miles from downtown Chicago — clashed repeatedly with police.

35 WHITES SEIZED

Police said 35 white persons had been arrested and 11 persons had been injured.

More than 200 white teen-agers marched down a street behind a huge sign reading in red letters "Wallace" — Gov. George C. Wallace of Alabama.

The howling group was followed by a caravan of cars, horns honking. Police broke the march up and the youths scattered.

OFFICER A TARGET

A new yellow convertible tried to run down a policeman. Police jumped into the car, pulled three white men out and subdued them.

A crowd of 1,000 white persons watched and screamed "police brutality."

A Negro man not involved in the earlier demonstrations was stopped as he drove along a street. He was pulled from the car and beaten.

The demonstrators — white and Negroes — left the area in chartered buses. Rocks were thrown by thousands of white persons in Marquette Park, a scenic park in the neighborhood.

SNAKE THROWN

A dead snake was thrown at the demonstrators as they boarded the buses.

A squad car moved out of the park with an injured man lying in the back seat, his feet sticking out the window.

The crowd had a new chant: "Roses are red, violets are black; King would look good with a dagger in his back."

During the march — protesting alleged housing discrimination — many residents stood on their front porches taking motion pictures of the activity.

The eruption of violence between the residents and some 6,200 policemen came after King had moved most of the civil rights demonstrators out of the area.

King, chairman of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, was hit on the right side of the face by a rock when he emerged from a car in Marquette Park earlier to form the march.

"It hurts, but it's not an injury," King shouted over the crowd of screaming, cursing, rock-throwing residents.

As the marchers left the park thousands of white persons lined a slope overlooking the park and shouted "white power."

A firecracker was thrown into one bus as demonstrators boarded, exploding in the face of a Negro photographer. He was momentarily stunned and was slightly burned on the face.

Before leaving the park, King told newsmen: "We shall have to keep coming back until we are safe from harassment. Until Negroes can move into the neighborhood the tenets of freedom will continue to decay."

The marchers were pelted with rocks, bottles, cherry bombs and eggs — some dropped by residents perched in trees — as they moved slowly down the street six abreast.

Police Fire Weapons in Air to Protect Housing Rally in Segregated District

By GENE ROBERTS

Special to The New York Times

CHICAGO, Aug. 7 — The police fought back thousands of jeering whites today as civil rights demonstrators continued their protests against "housing discrimination."

Riot control officers fired weapons into the air and used nightsticks to disperse angry whites who were throwing bottles, rocks and firecrackers at both policemen and marchers.

"White power, white power!" the mob screamed.

Each time the force of 500 policemen dispersed the crowds they regrouped and began following and taunting the marchers once again. Even a summer downpour failed to send the white hecklers home.

At one point, shortly after the four-mile-long march began at 4:45 P.M., the police estimated that 3,000 to 5,000 persons were gathered near the march column.

Five Miles From Loop

Members of the National States' Rights party and the American Nazi party moved through the crowd distributing membership application forms and recruitment handbills.

One leaflet prepared by the Nazi party said:

"White men organize white guard—a call to arms from George Lincoln Rockwell."

"We expect you to be immediately available, with your own weapons and ammunition at home when we call on you to stand against the black rioters—when the police are overwhelmed," the leaflet said.

Members of the States' Rights party carried a huge red, white and blue party flag with a jagged thunderbolt insignia in the middle. When the first drops of rain fell, they quickly furled their party flag, but continued to wave American flags.

Today's tension developed in the all-white Belmont-Cragin neighborhood, which is heavily East European in its ethnic makeup. It is in the city's Northwest, about five miles from the Loop.

The Rev. James Bevel and other leaders of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference led the march in place of

Youths in the crowd of hecklers wore paper Ku Klux Klan hoods and carried such placards as "Stop the Black Plague," and "Out With Kerner [the Governor of Illinois] and In With Wallace (the segregationist Governor of Alabama."

A middle-aged and bespectacled white woman carried a drawing of a spear-carrying cannibal with the legend "Kiss Me, I'm Equal."

Policemen rushed the crowds again and again in attempts to disperse them and struck back at bottle and rock throwers with their nightsticks. One man who weighed more than 200 pounds rushed three policemen and 10 blue helmeted officers swarmed over him, pummeling him with nightsticks.

Sing 'Trooper Song'

"Go home, you nigger lovers and niggers," the crowds yelled. Then they began chanting, "Two, four, six, eight, we don't want to integrate."

Some began singing "The Alabama Trooper Song," which has become the official song of white hecklers during Negro demonstrations over the last week.

"If I were an Alabama trooper," the song ends, "then I could kill the niggers legally."

Hundreds of whites began assembing in the area two hours before the first of 700 marchers arrived, and they were joined later by others, some of whom were obviously out for Sunday strolls.

One white heckler walked along with his wife on one arm and a yapping dachshund under the other.

"I'm paying all this tax money so you guys can run me off the street," he berated the police. "To hell with you guys."

"They got to do something, honey," his wife replied.

Across the street, a heckler waved a sign saying, "God Bless White Bigots."

A squad car moved ahead of the marchers, and a lieutenant inside announced over a public address system: "In the name of the people of Illinois you are commanded to disperse."

Mob-Arrest Statute

Comdr. John Mulchrone, head of the city's special riot-control task force, explained that the announcement was part of the machinery making it possible for the police, if necessary, to use a "mob arrest statute." The statute makes it a felony to engage in mob action.

"But we would only make arrests under this statute as an absolute last resort," Commander Mulchrone said.

He added that several persons had been arrested today but all of them under city misdemeanor ordinances.

Although the crowds weere as large, there was not as much rock and bottle throwing as on Friday when Dr. King led marchers into a white residential area south of here. Then, Dr. King was staggered by a rock hurled from the mob and at elast 28 others received injuries.

Today's march was the fifth within a week that civil rights demonstrators have led in an effort to desegregate housing in overwhelmingly white neighborhoods of this city.

Last Sunday, white mobs stoned demonstrators, and burned and otherwise damaged more than 20 of the demonstrators' cars, in the same area in which Friday's outbreak took place. Then in midweek the marchers were hissed and booed as they walked through Belmont Cragin, the scene of today's march.

Court Cuts Chicago March To One a Day, By Only 500

AC 8/20/66

CHICAGO (AP) — A Circuit Court judge issued a temporary injunction Friday limiting civil rights demonstrators to 500 and permitting only one march a day in Chicago.

Judge Cornelius J. Harrington ordered the Chicago Freedom Movement demonstrators to congregate only during daylight hours — excluding rush hour periods — and to give police 24-hour notice of any marches.

Judge Harrington acted on a suit filed a few hours earlier by the city of Chicago.

Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., chairman of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference and leader of the Chicago demonstrations, promptly labeled the action as "unjust, illegal and unconstitutional" and added:

"We are prepared to put thousands in the street if need be. The city hasn't seen the number of people we can put there."

The temporary injunction goes into effect immediately and will stand until a hearing on a permanent injunction.

Demonstrators acting under King's banner have been marching into all-white neighborhoods protesting against housing discrimination, sparking some violence and rioting.

The court action came as Chicago leaders met in an effort to hammer out a workable agreement on housing policies. The committee will report its findings to the full committee later this month.

The suit, filed against King and other leaders, ordered specifically:

1. Limit the number of marchers to 500.

2. Provide for only one march a day in Chicago.

3. Set times for marches in daylight hours only, excluding rush-hour periods.

4. Give the police superintendent 24 hours notice of any demonstrators.

Mayor Richard J. Daley, appearing on Chicago television stations Friday night, said he regretted the necessity of court action and added: "But I have repeatedly appealed for voluntary recognition of the rights of others and to end the kind of street demonstrations which have made it impossible for the police department to adequately protect the lives and property of all citizens.

"The suit does not seek to prohibit the right of all citizns to petition for redress of grievances. The only purpose is to assure every family of adequate police protection."

The suit alleged that the defendants' actions during the last month "and their announced intention to expand the demonstrations into many neighborhoods at simultaneous times constitute a clear and present danger to the city."

Sheriff Asks King Drop Cicero March

DEMONSTRATIONS

AC 8/23/66

CHICAGO (UPI) — Sheriff Richard B. Ogilvie appealed to Martin Luther King Monday to abandon plans to stage a civil rights march in racially sensitive Cicero Sunday. He said "the danger to the public and the demonstrators is too great."

The Cook County (Chicago) sheriff, alarmed by a new outburst of violence against negro and white civil rights demonstrators, sent the appeal to King at the Chicago headquarters of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

Ogilvie said he would have fewer than 500 police available to guard the demonstrators for open occupancy, and he estimated it would take 3,000 to protect the marchers in Cicero. The National Guard was called out 15 years ago to put down rioting against Negroes in the all-white suburb.

COURT THREAT

The sheriff said if King ignored his request, he would consider court action. He said a call for National Guard troops "is certainly a possibility."

Gov. Otto Kerner, who would have to issue any order calling the guard into action, conferred with high-level civil rights and human relations leaders in his Chicago office.

King and his aides were not among the conferees and both a Kerner spokesman and one of the conferees said the current demonstrations for open occupancy were not discussed.

LEADERS MEETING

Civil rights leaders scheduled a mass meeting for Monday night. They said they would announce an "action," presumably another march, for Tuesday.

Civil rights lawyers meanwhile made plans to go into court and challenge an injunction which holds the open-housing campaigners to no more than one march a day in Chicago and limits the marchers to 500 persons.

They said no court move would be made Monday because they still had to make "the basic decision of whether to pursue the matter in federal or state court."

The forces of Martin Luther King obeyed the injunction Sunday when they carried their demands for open-housing for Negroes throughout the Chicago area into the far southeast side and two southern suburbs, Chicago Heights and Evergreen Park.

Hundreds of Chicago police held back thousands of cursing, screaming, white youths who tossed rocks and other objects at the marchers.

In Evergreen Park, whites attacked the marchers almost at will, screaming "black blood" and hurling bricks and stones.

An aide of King said 20 to 30 marchers were hurt. In contrast, the marchers in Chicago Heights were virtually ignored.

Early Monday three men were arrested after a group of about 10 whites stoned two autos carrying eight Negroes on Chicago's South Side. Police said the driver of one of the cars was hit on the head by a rock and a woman was pulled from his car and beaten by the white men.

An End to Being Different

In 1966 the South may be said to be generally excited by the prospect of losing its ancient shackles and moving into that new South so often proclaimed by prophets of the past. Yet, it already is plain that the so-called new South is not to be a merely new Jerusalem, "separate" and "different," isolated spiritually and emotionally from the rest of the nation. The new South, still retarded by some unwilling to accept the new, is, for the first time, moving into the mainstream of national life and taking on a feeling of national unity, as opposed to one of being "different" and "separate."

There is a slow realization that the economic backwardness which, from the beginning of the Civil War, condemned the slave-holding South to the verdict at Appomattox had its roots in the low production of labor and in the retardation of technology and creation of a skilled labor force. The costs of being "different" are by no means paid.

Good Book

A new book, "The Political Economy of Slavery," by Eugene D. Genovese, of Rutgers University, is a good text book to be read with others in seeking an understanding of the Southern regions. (Published by Pantheon Books.)

The economic backwardness that was to leave so cruelly its stamp on the region for so long a time early expressed itself. "Bondage," says Genovese,

The economic backwardness that was to leave so cruelly its stamp on the region for so long a time early expressed itself. "Bondage," says Genovese, "forced the Negro to give his labor grudgingly and badly, and his poor work habits retarded those social and economic advances that could have raised the general level of production. Less direct were limitations imposed on the free work force, on technological development, and on the division of labor."

The small commercial class in the South was tied to the slave-holding interests. It had, therefore, "little desire or opportunity to invest capital in industrial expansion." Southern industrialists were in an analogous position. "The Southern yeomanry, unlike the Western, lacked the purchasing power to sustain rapid industrial development. . . . The planters spent much of their money abroad for luxuries. The plantation market consisted primarily of the demand for cheap slave clothing and cheap agricultural implements for use or misuse by the slaves. Southern industrialism needed a sweeping agrarian revolution to provide it with cheap labor and a substantial rural market, but Southern industrialists depended on the existing, limited plantation market."

Plantation System

That the plantation system, which held back industrial, commercial, and banking development, also depleted the soil is a historic fact. It was this depletion which was one of the forces behind the drive to expand slave territory.

The first agricultural machines began to revolutionize grain and food production in the developing, opening West. But the plantation system was bound to the gang-labor methods.

By the mid-1840s some planters in Maryland and Virginia had begun to try crop diversification and livestock development. They sold many of their slaves to the lower, or deep South, cotton states. By the 1850's, writes Genovese, the deficiencies of slavery that had forced innovation in the upper South were bringing on swift deterioration in the deeper South. Fresh land was necessary. The Southern slave economy was more and more political and moved steadily toward the insoluble crisis.

The South has paid a price in lack of skills, education, industry and income since those days of more than a century ago. That there should be Southerners and Southern communities that try to hold back the rescue of the region is incredible. Their number grows smaller, but they remain.

COMPLIANCE BY EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS IN ALABAMA, FLORIDA, GEORGIA, MISSISSIPPI, SOUTH CAROLINA AND TENNESSEE WITH TITLE VI, 1964 CIVIL RIGHTS ACT

Prepared for U.S. Civil Rights Commission by Equal Educational Opportunities Program, Office of Education, U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare

April 14, 1965 Atlanta, Georgia

Title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act provides that "no persons shall, on the ground of race, color or national origin, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefit of, or be subject to discrimination under any program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance."

This non-discrimination provision requires the abandonment of racially segregated dual school systems wherever they exist.

No State agencies, local school districts or institutions of higher learning may receive Federal assistance under programs administered by the U.S. Office of Education unless they are in compliance with this provision of the Act.

In programs such as School Assistance to Federally Affected Areas, where direct payments are made to school districts, only the district is required to be in compliance. In all other current programs, where funds are allocated to the State for distribution to local school districts, both the State agency receiving funds and the local districts to whom the money is distributed must be in compliance. All colleges and universities receiving Federal funds under current programs must be in compliance.

Estimated Federal obligations for various education programs for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1965, to the States covered in this report are as follows:

State education agencies that receive Federal funds for their own use or for distribution to local school districts under programs administered by the U.S. Office of Education must submit a Statement of Compliance with the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

This Statement of Compliance must state that the State agency will not discriminate in providing services, financial aid or other benefits under these programs, or in its administrative practices, such as staff assignments, professional meetings and use of State offices.

It must also include a list of any instances of non-compliance with Title VI and must outline the methods of administration, staffing arrangements, assignment of responsibilities and procedures that the State agency will follow to remedy these instances of non-compliance.

Current U.S. Office of Education programs for which a State Statement of Compliance is required are:

National Defense Act of 1958
- Employment Acquisition (Title III)
- Guidance, Counseling and Testing (Title V-A)
- Educational Statistics Service (Title X, Section 1009)

Smith-Hughes Act (Vocational Education)
George-Barden Act (Vocational Education)
Vocational Education Act of 1963
- Vocational Education (Section 3)
- Work-Study Programs (Section 13)

Manpower Development and Training Act of 1962
- (Arrangements for Training)

Economic Opportunity Act
- Adult Basic Education (Title II-B)

Public Library Services and Construction Act
Educational Improvement for Handicapped Children and Youth Act

State Statements of Compliance will also be required for programs under the new Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965. Estimated payments under this Act going to the States covered in this report are as follows:

	Title I, education of children of low income families	Title II, school library resources, text-books and other instructional materials	Title III, supplementary educational centers and services	Title V, Strengthening State Departments of Education	Total Federal payments

Tennessee	31,092,525	1,826,346	1,965,556	428,208	35,312,635

In some States, funds for all current Federal programs distributed through the State are handled by the State department of education. In other States, there may be State library boards or State vocational educational boards that handle funds for Federally-assisted programs. It is necessary that each State agency involved sign a Statement of Compliance for the specific programs in which it participates.

A comparison of payments to States and local school districts under existing programs and under programs covered by the new law is as follows:

	Existing programs direct to school districts	Existing programs handled through States	New Elementary and Secondary Act	Combined
Alabama	$ 8,389,900	$ 8,673,671	$ 35,727,438	$ 52,791,009
Florida	12,991,200	11,714,673	33,752,644	58,458,517

Local school districts that wish to participate in Federal assistance programs administered by the Office of Education directly or through the States can comply with Title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act in one of three ways:

A school district that is completely desegregated should submit an Assurance of Compliance (HEW 441) stating that it does not discriminate and can assure full compliance.

A school district that is under a final court order directing complete desegregation should submit a copy of the order and indicate its plans and procedures for carrying out the order.

A school district that is not fully desegregated and is not under a final court order should submit its detailed plan for bringing about desegregation.

CURRICULUM QUESTIONS FOR EQUAL EDUCATIONAL OPPORTUNITY

(Based on an address to the Evaluation and Training Institute for Directors of Summer Institutes on Problems of Desegregation, held at Dillard University, New Orleans, Louisiana - October 13, 1965)

Since the interposition of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, desegregation is proceeding with somewhat less deliberation and with somewhat more speed. In hundreds of classrooms, bodies are being "mixed" as Dan Dodson expresses it. A better description would be to say that more minority group children, than ever before, are sitting in classrooms near and with majority group children. What does this juxtaposition tell us about how the newcomers feel or how they have been received by teachers or classmates? Have they been inevitably relegated to slower learning groups? Have they entered a world in which they are merely tolerated, a world without color or multi-cultural refraction; a world unrelated to their homes and family circumstances?

Desegregation is essential to the healthy survival of American democracy, but desegregation, unaccompanied by educational change, is but a faltering step on the pathway to equal educational opportunity. Advocates of quality education grow "steadily more certain that no major problem of education..... more really effective teaching and learning.....has ever been solved solely or even primarily, by legal or administrative action. Such action lays the necessary groundwork and provides the setting in which good teachers may carry on their work. But the critical point in any educational system is found ultimately in the relation between the teacher and the pupil."[1]

American democratic ideals have urged that the individual achieve the best that is in him; and that society develop the maximum potentialities of each individual at every level of ability. When schools provide each youngster with the particular education that most benefits him, then and only then does equality of opportunity become a meaningful concept.[2] Although the ideal was professed early in American history with the establishment of free public education, the record of draft rejections alone emphasizes the wide gap between ideal and realization.

National interest underscored by presidential endorsement has presented the educational establishment with unprecedented financial support in expanding and improving educational programs. This paper argues that a critical examination and appraisal of the curriculum should now engage the energies of the education establishment. By curriculum is meant the sum total of experiences, within and without the school, which the school utilizes to further the aims of education.[3] The effective curriculum is one which reflects current forces and their impact, and utilizes all appropriate resources to secure the values and higher purposes of our society.[4] The effective curriculum is based on solid psychological foundations established through research in cognition.

Such research insists that learning must express itself as observable behavior if it is to persist beyond the initial learning experience. The most fundamental law of learning behavior is that learning occurs when it is successful, rewarded, and re-inforced by successful repetition.[5] Practice alone will not ensure appropriate behavior as many teacher has discovered who assigned some unruly child to one hundred repetitions of "I must not talk!" Threats and punishment will not ensure appropriate behavior. Children retort to such strategies with their own strategies of indifference, withdrawal, hostility or truancy. Teacher guidance, approbation, the support that immediately follows the desired behavior establishes strong connections between the correct response and satisfaction.

Such satisfactions are most significant in transferring to other life situations. Success promotes purposeful rational behavior and further learning. Failure produces bewilderment, disorganization, and irrationality.

Psychological research has added more dimensions to the concepts of physiological and psychological maturation or readiness as a pre-requisite to learning. Readiness requires a reservoir of pre-school language experience with adults in an environment that provides a fair chance for success in new situations. Children must be free from anticipation and expectation of failure. They must perceive the importance of the new learning and its relevancy to their personal developmental needs.

It is worth repeating that for all learners, adult as well as children, success is of maximal significance. Success is the child's recognition of growth in self-mastery, in skill, in self-expression - the growth may be minute or considerable, it must be genuine and earned. Children are not deceived by fulsome praise lavished by sentimental teachers. Confronted with such subterfuges, children develop subtle avoidances of failure. But success re-inforced by simple sincere acceptance leads to further effort and further success.

Since learning is purposeful, the learner's motives must be meaningful to himself; specific and reasonably certain of attainment. Strange that adults who recognize for themselves the importance of purpose in their learning, assume that children will accept superimposed goals without demurral!

Research reminds us that thinking occurs when the individual is challenged, puzzled, curious, and emotionally involved. Rarely if ever is it responsive to the authoritative direction "Think!" or the bland assumption "You know the answer." Children do measure, compare, classify, evaluate, and form judgments. How correct they are in appraising the underlying emotions of their teachers, in the face of verbal assertions to the contrary! Effective thinking or problem-solving takes place when children select activities, raise their own questions and seek their own answers.

Applying such conceptualizations of the psychology of learning, a successful school program today must devote itself to three simultaneous fronts[6]: it must demonstrate the close relationship between school and the outer world to the pupils; it must include skills and competencies essential for effective participation in the outer world; it must arouse aspirations for broader channels of living in our emerging society. A tremendous variety of approaches are to be sought to meet the needs of different age levels, different abilities, different outlooks.

In the narrow sense, Curriculum development will not by itself improve the act of teaching.[7] It will, it can, and it does create opportunities for improved learning. By providing teachers with new and improved tools, curriculum development changes teacher behavior and attitudes.

For the 1960's have cast the teacher in a new role. No longer is she the primary source of information, the task setter, the drill master. Her role is far more complex. She taps the widest available resources to seek material. She creates an atmosphere of acceptance and respect within the classroom. She enforces or blights the self-esteem of the learners.[8] From a wide spectrum, she chooses those learning experiences which will spark children's interest. She examines each child to determine his own strengths and weaknesses and the learning style to which he best accomodates himself. She is the bridge between child and home, between school and community, between the child's limited present and his expanding future.

Here lies a challenge to teacher training institutions, to in-service programs, to seminars, discussion groups, to all the forces which will strengthen teachers in their new roles.

No less crucial to success in learning is the child's view of himself. If the teacher must be regarded as the facilitator of learning, the child must perceive himself as teachable.

*8. Taba, Hilda. "Cultural Deprivation and School Learning" - Merrill-Palmer Quarterly, April 1964

Martin Deutsch[9] has pointed out that schools may reinforce invidious self-concepts that children have or may instead develop a positive self-image. Holt devotes an entire volume to children's expectations of their failure in elementary school.[10] But self-respect is acquired through success at one's tasks. It is enhanced by the recognition that one's family and group is respected, valued as positive assets to the society. Schools which are color-blind or culture-blind are almost as damaging to self-respect as schools which are segregated. Multi-racial and multi-cultural textbooks connect the learner to his world. As children work with paints and clay; as they express themselves in music, rhythm, dramatic play, they realize their humanness as creative individuals. Also, success and the expectation of success determine whether the child will be moving in the mainstream of progress or shunted into the increasing group of hopelessly unemployables.

The emerging curriculum must present every opportunity for success. Are there other ways of providing for individual differences than by the fixed two or three-track educational systems suggested by Conant? Are there ways of grouping children so that the stigma of failure is not rigidly molded in the first few years of school life? Are there materials and modes of instruction which permit more self-pacing?

Much more research, preferably in action situations, is needed to determine classroom groupings less dependent on academic achievement than they have been in the past. Can children be formed into small interest groups working on short-term tasks? Can they be gathered by the teacher for specific skill training at different intervals? May not some children work better alone or with a buddy? To what extent have we permitted rigid conceptions about peer-group relationships to limit flexible grouping? If adults learn together effectively without reference to age, might not older and younger children meet in some classes? Have we capitalized on everyone's delight in showing off, to encourage older children to help with younger ones? Have college students been included to assist in high schools, or high school students to aid in the lower grades? The rigid homogeneous grouping of the past was more of a phantasy than a reality, since the individuals of any group varied in more respects than they resembled each other. For the children who were in the "dumb" class, the label frequently dimmed whatever timid hope of success the child brought to school.

Heterogeneous classes with wide range of potential demand new materials and devices. Here it becomes urgent that the establishment come to the aid of the teacher.[11] Devices that provide vicarious experiences must become standard school equipment - TV's, tapes, films, books. Children need free access to models which help them grasp fundamental structures. They need recourse to individual instructional materials which are programmed for small increments of information, not as a substitute for the teacher but as a source of self-paced self-rated learning. They should be surrounded by a wealth of pictures, texts, trade-books, maps, charts. The teacher will still remain the significant adult in the classroom; the new equipment will help to clarify the children's values, personalize their experiences, and provide opportunities for intellectual discovery.

*11. Bruner, Jerome - Process of Education - Random House, N. Y. 1960

No apology is needed for technological and other innovations in education, because no individual teacher can, in herself, totalize the wealth of resources in the fields of knowledge. The scientific and technological explosion of the present century is almost beyond belief. In 1960 alone, 60,000,000 pages of research and development were published in 55,000 journals.[12] The teacher therefore assists her students to use the skill tools to solve their problems. She depends on other broad sources of information, notably, the library which as a center of learning, promotes self-direction and provides breadth of purpose for children. The library has outgrown its former aspect as a collection of catalogued books. Stocked with tapes, films, records, teaching machines, it can be a rich resource for teachers as well as children. The teacher may use it as a professional fount, and as a laboratory for the testing and exploration of new materials.

Along with sources of information, the teacher needs broad guides in the form of courses of study. New curricula in specific areas have been devised in the sciences and in mathematics and extensive revisions in the humanities and the social studies are on the way.[13] For the first time, the best minds of the country have joined forces to structure the new knowledge into exciting series of lessons. These new courses need testing in the classroom by the experienced and beginning practitioners. They should be demonstrated in special centers to which teachers may turn. They should, after testing and evaluation, be incorporated by teacher-training institutes in the hope that the usual time-lag between practice and theory be curtailed.

In the lower schools, primary attention must be devoted to the area of reading which reaps the largest number of academic failures. Extensive experimentation should resolve some of the controversy between the phoneticists, the structural linguists, and the exponents of sight reading. Some progress has been enthusiastically reported with the use of Pittman's initial teaching alphabet (ITA). Several programs which present minute increments of phonetics in structured situations are being tested with illiterate adults and discouraged teen-agers. Very promising in terms of motivation and self-direction is the individualized reading program in which children select their books from a wide interest and ability range of titles. A variety of multi-cultural and urban reading series such as the Bank Street Readers, and the Great Cities Reading Improvement Program, bring city life and cultural differences into the classroom.

One of the significant contributions of the Headstart program is its carefully planned language art lessons. Children need many models of good speech and opportunities for communication about the things that delight them. Language laboratories, children's records, and selected radio or television programs make desirable speech important to the listener. The Communications Laboratory of the Bank Street College of Education is producing reading incentive films which present a well-known actor reading a children's story. The emotional impact is strong as the child realizes that his teacher is holding the very book which is being shown on the screen. Such films give children new and more acceptable models for imitation than they may find even in school.

New roles, based on new applications of newly formulated laws of learning; new courses of study; new instructional materials. In an age of superstandardization, what will expedite rapid educational change? The most creative and imaginative approaches by all agents of change in the community need to be marshalled to temper and adapt the individual styles of teachers, beginners or experts to curriculum reform.[14] Administrators and supervisors too need strong community support in streamlining patterns of classroom organization. All concerned with the vast responsibilities of nurturing young Americans must see the child as Henry Steele Commager did when he said, "A child's mind is not a vessel to be filled but a flame to be kindled."

This new binocular view of the child and the curriculum for his maximum development will put instructional flesh on the administrative bones. Desegregation is a limited goal; but the provision of the best learning climate for all children, of all ethnic origins, on all economic levels is the ultimate goal. The time has come to translate theory into practice; to achieve through the collaboration of disciplinary experts, educators, and community leaders, long-standing democratic ideals of equal educational opportunity.

On behalf of children who have been robbed of their birthright by economic circumstance, community prejudice, or parental deprivation

*14. Education of Deprived and Segregated - A Coop. Research Project Bank Street College of Education, N. Y. 1963

Kenneth Clark has brilliantly summarized our common goals,[15] "Let us approach these children in terms of educational requirements, standards and demands as if they were human beings and not lepers. Let us not teach these children as if they were different, as if one had to be specially careful how you teach them to read. Human beings can learn; their lower class predecessors of a generation or two ago learned. They can learn if they are respected. They can learn if it is communicated to them that those who are responsible for teaching them believe they can learn and, above all, they can learn if they are taught and if they are taught with precisely the same standards and quality of instruction as are given to more privileged children."

MAJOR SOURCE OF LEADERS

Negro Colleges Linked to Opportunity

By PHIL GAILEY

Negro colleges in the South are the "major source of opportunity for Negroes," the president of an Atlanta Negro college said here Tuesday.

"The new frontier for Negroes is in the South and I believe our Negro colleges will be at the heart of it in training Negro leadership," said Vivian Henderson, president of Clark College.

At the closing session of a two-day seminar sponsored by the College Entrance Examination Board, Dr. Henderson said he disagrees with those who urge the closing of Negro colleges.

In fact, he said, more financial support is needed to strengthen them and make them attractive to white students.

He said Clark College actively recruits white students.

He said perhaps more than 90 per cent of the South's Negro students are educated in Negro colleges, which have been "performing miracles for a number of years."

"They told us it was impossible. But we've been making silk out of cotton in the colleges," Dr. Henderson said.

For many years free debate was permitted in these colleges only in the South, he asserted.

Earlier, a Louisiana educator told the seminar that young persons are needed as consumers and not as producers in today's society.

"The stark fact we must grasp firmly is that in our society the young person is surplus. He is not needed as a producer; however, he is needed as a consumer," said Irwin Berg, dean of the college of arts and sciences at Louisiana State University.

Young persons could flood the job market if the war in Viet Nam suddenly ended, he said, and their return to civilian life could create a crisis unless they were carefully phased out.

John Popham, managing editor of the Chattanooga Times, said as the academic world moves into new fields of knowledge seeking answers to our problems, the press has a responsibility to communicate this knowledge to society.

He said people must dismiss old attitudes and ideas and "recognize that academic attitudes demand a reconstructing of the social order."

The South, he added, is providing the human laboratory that is needed in bringing about change.

James Edmonson, president of Judson College in Marion, Ala., said the church - related liberal arts colleges are running out of money and time.

He said the student will probably wind up paying a greater share of the cost.

"Business admire us for turning down federal aid; however, they offer us very little in financial support," he said.

John Frazer, president of Kentucky Independent Colleges Foundation, Louisville, said too much recognition is being given to researchers while outstanding teachers receive little recognition.

"We are going to have to put something back into teaching," Frazer said.

Georgia Lags In Education

AC 3/13/66

Despite 540 Per Cent Hike In Spending Over 20 Years

By TOM GREENE

Georgia has increased its financing of all levels of education by a whopping 540 per cent since 1948, but "still lags behind the nation and even some of its Southern neighbors with lesser resources."

This is the finding of an exhaustive survey of Georgia's educational financing released this week by the Georgia Educational Improvement Council, a state agency created in 1964 to carry out the work of the Governor's Commission to Improve Education.

Income earmarked for education in the state—elementary, secondary and college — has jumped from $78 million in 1948-49 to a projected $498 million for 1966-67. Over half of this total increase has taken place since 1960.

(These figures do not include income for capital outlay or auxiliary enterprises, but is limited to educational and general operating expenses.)

GEORGIA now commits 58 per cent of all its state funds to education.

Most of the increase has gone for higher education, from $16 million to $112 million, or a 590 per cent increase, while income for elementary and secondary education has jumped 527 per cent from $62 million to $386 million.

Per pupil income has increased from $103 to $400 for elementary and secondary education and from $638 to $2,357 for higher education.

Most of the increase has gone for higher education, from $16 million to $112 million, or a 590 per cent increase, while income for elementary and secondary education has jumped 527 per cent from $62 million to $386 million.

Per pupil income has increased from $103 to $400 for elementary and secondary education and from $638 to $2,357 for higher education.

Income for higher education alone will be greater next year than was the total educational income in 1950-'51, according to the report.

It has required an average of almost $13 million a year just to stay even because of inflation, the survey reports, while $4.4 million a year has gone to take care of growing enrollment. Over $6 million yearly has gone for enrichment of the school programs.

THE REPORT admits that the inflationary amount cited is somewhat exaggerated because it includes the increase in salaries for teachers and other educational staff, which is necessary in attracting and holding qualified personnel. To this extent, it can be attributed to the improvement of educational quality. About half the inflationary figure, or $6.5 million, can be attributed to this.

During the 19 - year period covered in the report, income for public education has increased more than two and a half times as fast as personal income in the state.

State appropriations, the leading source of income, has increased about seven times over the period, from $42.4 million to $296.4 million. State appropriations alone for 1966-67 are greater than all educational income in 1961-62. Local funds provide the second largest amount, with federal appropriations, gifts, grants, endowments, student fees and other sources providing the rest.

Gifts and endowments have shown a sharp increase over the period, from less than half a million dollars in 1948-49 to $11.2 million.

"The staggering increase of income for the support of educational operations in Georgia since 1948 made possible the meeting of basic challenges with solid educational achievements," the report says.

SOME OF these achievements are providing educational opportunities for 57 per cent more elementary and secondary students and almost 100 per cent more college students; a 62 per cent increase in the number of lower school teachers and 72 per cent college faculty; increased average salary of elementary and secondary teachers by 201 per cent and college by 118.5 per cent; increased the number of high school graduated by 2½ times and many other achievements.

But "even a casual review of the data presented . . . indicates that the need for increasing income to support educational operations will continue" because school enrollments will continue to grow, inflation will continue, and demands for enrichment of educational programs will continue.

Georgia has "provided enough income to care for unprecedented increase in enrollment to cope with heavy inroads of inflation and to enrich education through expansion and qualitative improvement of programs," the report concludes.

"In so doing, Georgia has narrowed the gap between its relatively low rankings in most indexes of financial support and that of other states in the region and the nation.

"THE GAPS, however, are still too large and there are other states in the region and nation exerting a greater effort relative to their financial capacity than Georgia."

Conditions requiring large increases in educational spending will continue to exist, the study shows, and to remedy the weaknesses "long-range financial study, planning and public dissemination" of the findings are needed on a systematic, continuing basis.

"No such regularized procedure exists for long-range financial planning" now, the report said, and suggests that perhaps the Educational Improvement Council, representing a cross section of the state, should take on the job.

SREB Gets $300,000 Grant To Boost Negro-College Role

By TOM GREENE

The Atlanta-based Southern Regional Education Board has received a $300,000 grant from the Carnegie Corp. for a project to improve the 118 predominantly Negro colleges in the South.

The project was announced jointly Sunday by the New York corporation and SREB.

The money will be used to provide staff assistance for SREB's newly formed Commission on Higher Educational Opportunity in the South, which will direct the project.

The commission is composed of university educators and state officials from the 15 member states of SREB. Gov. Sanders, SREB chairman, will serve as ex-officio chairman of the commission and has appointed its members, who include O. C. Aderhold, president of the University of Georgia.

George Watts Hill Jr. of Durham, N.C., chairman of the North Carolina Board of Higher Education, has been named commission chairman.

DR. WINFRED L. GODWIN, director of SREB, said the commission will seek to develop the predominantly Negro colleges and universities to maximum effectiveness so they may play a full role in providing increased educational opportunity in the South.

The commission will have two major tasks, Dr. Godwin said:

—To prepare for publication and broad dissemination a report on the general status of predominantly Negro institutions in the South, their changing roles and relationships. The report will take about a year to prepare, he said.

—To prepare guidelines for their future development in the total context of higher education.

"For the foreseeable future," he added, "despite growing integration of previously segregated institutions, Negro institutions are likely to be the major source of higher educational opportunity for Negroes. Also, many of them will become less predominantly Negro as they admit larger numbers of white students."

Dr. Godwin said SREB will seek additional public and private funds to carry out the work of the commission.

$22 Million Bonds Asked for Schools

EDUCATION

By DICK HEBERT

Atlanta School Superintendent Dr. John Letson called Monday for a $22 million school bond issue that would push Atlanta's school bonding capacity to the hilt and probably mean a 1 mill property tax increase.

He told the recently created Citizens Bond Commission that this $22 million does not come close to meeting present needs, but that with it "we believe we can provide a full school day for every Atlanta pupil."

The meeting with school officials was the bond commission's first session since organization. It was formed to study whether Atlanta should call a bond referendum and is expected to make its report this spring.

Letson told newsmen, " I don't believe there'll be any reason why the commission won't go the limit." He said the $22 million at least will "get us on the road toward meeting some of the urgent needs."

Letson told the commission members that the most urgent need is to remove double session schooling that now forces some 2,970 students in 11 elementary schools to get only a half day of schooling.

"This bond issue would mean the difference between double sessions and a full day of classes for these children for the first time in a long time," he said.

Letson told newsmen "We're shooting for a bond election in May."

He said the $22 million in bonds would likely mean a tax increase of one mill, or a dollar in taxes for each $1,000 of assessed valuation.

He said the bond issue doesn't come near meeting needs of future growth or of needs that may be caused by annexation into Atlanta of the Sandy Springs and Adamsville areas.

$62 MILLION

He said total needs of the city school system now stand at $62.4 million—for 14 new elementary schools, three high schools, additions and renovations to 20 elementary schools and 13 high schools, two new stadiums and a $6 million Central Office Building.

He listed top priority needs that alone total more than the allowed $22 million in bonds. The list totals $26.4 million, of which $5 million would go for a new Simpson-Hightower High School.

The list of top priorities also includes a $2.1 million Vine City junior high, a new $1.5 million elementary school to take care of children in the proposed Washington-Rawson urban renewal housing project, and five other new elementary schools.

IN RENOVATIONS

It also includes $6.85 million in additions or renovations to existing schools, $400,000 in new libraries for elementary schools, $450,000 for relighting in existing schools, $480,000 for 40 supplementary classrooms and $1.32 million for land acquisition.

With slide presentations, the superintendent showed how Atlanta school children are going to classes in the Old Folks Home, former dwellings, scout huts, school buildings built during the 1800s and on streets that have become heavily traveled in dense business districts.

"We continue to fall behind when we do not spend at least $5 million a year on our school plant," he warned.

His first priority list included:

New schools: Simpson-Hightower High, $5 million; Vine City Jr. High, $2.1 million; Washington-Rawson Elementary, $1.5 million; Harlan Road Elementary, a replacement for Lee Street Elementary being razed for urban renewal, a new Pryor Elementary, and a new D. H. Stanton Elementary, $900,000 each; English Avenue Primary, $300,000.

Additions and renovations: Washington, Northside, Dykes and Fulton High schools, $1 million each; Carver High gym, music and ROTC addition, $900,000; Wesley-Whitefoord Elementary, $500,000; Gideons Elementary, $450,000; Humphries and Venetian Elementary, $400,000 each; Blair Village Elementary, $200,000.

Elementary school libraries at Brandon, Capitol Avenue, Carter, Cascade Connally, Cooper Street, East Lake, English Avenue, Gordon, Goldsmith, Grant Park, Harris, John Hope, E. P. Howell, Inman Park, McClatchey, Mount Vernon, Pitts, Ragsdale, Spring Street, Walker Street, Ware and Wesley Avenue schools, totaling $400,000.

Relighting at Dykes High, Murphy High, Carver Vocational and the elementary schools of Beecher Hills, Birney, Blair Village, Brewer, Bryant, Carey, Clement, Cleveland, Collier Heights, Cook, Craddock, Forrest, Gideons, Gilbert, Hardnett, Harper, Haygood, Herndon, Highland, M. S. Howell, Hutchinson, J. M. Jones, Kimberly, Mayson, McClatchey, Mitchell, Peterson, Reynolds, Rivers, Scott, Slater, D. H. Stanton, Tuxedo, Waters, Wesley, Whitefoord and Wright, totaling $450,000.

Supplementary classrooms (40 units) at Walter George High and the elementary schools of Ben Hill, Collier Heights, Hardnett, M. Howell, Hutchinson, Lin, M. Mitchell and Reynolds, $480,000 total.

Land for Dykes High addition, $225,000; for English Avenue Primary, $100,000; for Lee Street Elementary replacement, $155,000; for a new D. H. Stanton Elementary, $220,000; for Vine City Junior High, $500,000, and for Washington-Rawson Elementary, $120,000.

State School Board Adopts $1,200 Teacher Pay Raise

By JOE BROWN
Constitution Education Writer

The State Board of Education Wednesday adopted a $1,200 a year salary increase for beginning teachers and comparable raises for experienced teachers effective in the fall of 1967.

The $60 million in raises which will peg the minimum annual salary of a beginning teacher at $5,200 cannot become effective unless the money is appropriated by the General Assembly.

State School Supt. Jack P. Nix said the proposed increases will be in the biennium budget the Department of Education is preparing to send to the Georgia Legislature in January.

The pay raises are necessary, Nix said, "to keep the brighter minds coming into the field of education."

Georgia will need an additional 4,000 teachers next fall to handle increased school enrollment, he said. Authorities estimate that Georgia colleges will only graduate about 2,700 trained teachers this year.

The additional teachers must be attracted from other areas and other fields, said Nix, if Georgia is to maintain the proper teacher-pupil ratio.

The raises, Nix added, will bring Georgia teacher salaries up to the national level.

"They will offer school boards and superintendents a chance to be selective about who they'll put in the classroom.

"Our salaries must become competitive or we'll never have quality education," he told the board.

State School Board Chairman James Peters of Manchester said he favored the increase but felt it was too small.

"We ought to go to a $6,000 minimum now," the 81-year-old chairman said.

Peters said that since the state is expecting a $97 million surplus this year it can easily afford the adopted pay scale.

Dear Dr. Via:

I was certainly heartening to observe the wide participation of labor, education and civic organizations in the Regional Conference of the American Federation of Teachers in Atlanta on March 26th. The contribution of your organization was appreciated by me because even as a northerner I've been aware of the influence of your work.

This summer the American Federation of Teachers in cooperation with the Southern Christian Leadership Conference will strive to establish Freedom Schools in the south. The success of this venture will to a great extent depend upon the cooperation we will receive from local groups. It is because of your liberal record in the past that I am asking you to seriously note the materials I am enclosing about the general nature of our summer project. I shall be in touch with you to share your reactions and suggestions on this endeavor.

Until then I am,

Yours truly,

An Introduction to the Freedom School Project

American Federation of Teachers, AFL-CIO

The dramatic growth and accomplishments of the Freedom Schools in the South during the last two years have made them a major motivating force in the civil rights movement.

The Freedom School project is now directed by the American Federation of Teachers (A.F.T.) and is financed by a nation-wide A.F.T. sponsored campaign for contributions.

One of the unique features of the A.F.T. Freedom School Project, and also one of the greatest factors in its success, is the living arrangements of Freedom School teachers. Obviously, the ten dollars per week provided to help defray living cost is completely inadequate for independent subsistence. Like the Peace Corps, the major aim of the project is to bring people together in "in depth" living situations which commit them mutually to the task of educating people. Unlike the Peace Corps, Freedom School teachers live in the homes of the local people who share what they have with them in every way possible. Both the teachers-guests and the parents-hosts declare that the experiences of mutual dependence and mutual respect resulting from these relationships are some of the most enlightening and gratifying aspects of the project.

The conditions under which teachers live provide the best way to understand the conditions, traditions, race relations and education problems of the South. However, preparatory orientation sessions are conducted before the teachers are sent to their teaching locations. These orientation sessions must be attended by all teachers sponsored by the A.F.T. to provide the vital insights absolutely necessary for success and safety in the South.

The preparatory orientation provides the teachers with insights into all civil rights activities going on and planned in the areas. The teachers meet key people working in all civil rights activities and gain first-hand information from the leaders via lectures and group discussions. The teachers also get their introduction to the problems of the local areas by the local Negro people themselves. Thus both teachers and students begin their experiences in sharing at the very outset of the program and continue throughout the duration of the summer. The teachers also evaluate one another's attitudes and conceptions of what their roles are and should be in the unique setting of the freedom schools and the purposes for which they are intended by the people who attend them, the people who organize them and those who conduct them.

GENERAL

INFORMATION

The American Federation of Teachers Freedom School Project is a voluntary service arrangement. The funds raised will provide a minimum amount of assistance to the volunteers in terms of (1) reimbursement of transportation cost to and from the southern area of participation, (2) school supplies, (3) small reimbursement for those who use their own transportation in the freedom school area and (4) a small stipend for subsistence to each volunteer. Thus the volunteer must be prepared to live under circumstances much different than that to which they are accustomed.

The only money that will be available for use in the Freedom School project will be that which is raised in the spring and summer A.F.T. Freedom School Fund Drive. This money will be used to provide round-trip bus fare for the A.F.T. sponsored teachers who volunteer to serve in the project. The teachers may use whatever mode of transportation they wish; however, reimbursement for transportation cost will be the equivalent of round-trip bus fare in every case.

School supplies will be purchased with some of the money raised in the fund drive. The kinds and amount of materials will be determined by the availability of the requested materials and the teacher making the request. Teachers must be prepared to exercise their "creative genius and ingenuity" in providing themselves and their students with teaching aids at a minimum cost.

Those teachers who drive their own cars into the South and use them for transportation while serving the Freedom Schools will be provided a small stipend for gasoline purchases. Transportation is a crucial problem for volunteers in the South. However car pools provide a major solution in all areas where Freedom Schools are held. The local citizens involved in civil rights work and who own some kind of vehicle always help as much as possible.

In past summers occasionally a Freedom School teacher has been arrested. We must face the fact that this harrassment tactic may well be stepped up as the diehard segregationists realize the effectiveness of the Freedom School Program in building voter registration and participation in other civil rights activities.

Our teachers therefore are asked to arrange for some one "back home" to be responsible for producing bond money immediately upon request, in the sum of at least two hundred dollars ($200.00), in case of emergency. All such "harrassment" cases are invariably reversed by higher courts and the money returned.

SCHOOLS IN SOUTH HELD INADEQUATE

Educators Assess Situation as Critical but Hopeful

By BEN A. FRANKLIN
Special to The New York Times

RICHMOND, Dec. 4 — Thousands of Southern educators this week found their schools and colleges seriously, even "critically," inadequate.

Their mood, however, was one of confidence in the future of education in "the New South," backed by growing popular and business support.

"We have no place to go but up," one Southern college president said, "and the great thing we have done here is to recognize it."

The occasion here was a double conference—the annual meeting of the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools, the voluntary academic accrediting agency for the 11 former Confederate states. And following it, the Southern Region Conference on Education, sponsored jointly by the association and the White House.

Through both meetings, nearly 3,000 principals, school administrators and college and university officials shared, with few dissents, in a candid public recital of the South's failings in education that Gov. Carl E. Sanders of Georgia called "a sorrowful litany."

Statistics Are Cited

The educators acknowledged:

¶That the South has the highest proportion of high school dropouts and the lowest proportion of high school graduates of any region in the country. In 1960, in all Southern states but Florida, more than 25 per cent of all persons over 25 years of age had less than eight years of schooling.

¶That the South has the highest rate of functional illiteracy of any region. The national average of draft rejections for mental deficiency is 24.7 per cent, the average rate in the South 40.6 per cent, and as high as 50 per cent in South Carolina, Louisiana and Mississippi.

¶That the national average of per-pupil expenditure for education is $525, and in the South $322. Per capita spending for education averages $102 in the nation, $71 in the South.

¶That nationally, the average state legislature has increased educational appropriations 75 per cent in the last five years, but in the South the increase has been 59 per cent.

¶That the average Southern teacher is paid $1,200 a year less than the national average teachers' salary, and the average professor is paid 20 per cent less.

¶That the inequality in the education of most Negroes has been virtually unchanged.

¶That a Southern high school graduate has only about half the probability of entering college of the average American high school graduate, and only one-third the probability of obtaining a degree of doctor of philosophy.

Bad For Business

The educators also agreed that the impoverishment of Southern education was bad for business in the "New South."

Governors Sanders and John B. Connally of Texas both called the self-criticism "part of the urgent educational process itself." Mr. Sanders endorsed a hard-hitting speech here Thursday by Vice President Humphrey in which Mr. Humphrey attacked the South's preoccupation with "its history." Mr. Humphrey repeatedly exhorted the educators to hasten the integration of Southern schools and to improve the quality of education for Negroes.

"Tomorrow," he declared, "the educator in the South will be seen as the creator of wealth, the man who brings money into the community."

'Something Is Wrong'

Mr. Connally, who is regarded as a conservative, said yesterday that "something has to be wrong with Southern education. We all know that something is wrong in a system where fewer than half our children who enter the first grade graduate from high school."

He said neither the Federal Government nor the states "intend to infringe upon local educational leadership and responsibility."

"The question," he said, "is do we have any local leadership to infringe on?"

Better education, Mr. Connally continued, is "a social and moral necessity for the South, but for those who won't think that far we can justify it on a purely economic basis."

This pragmatic theme was repeated at a panel discussion last night when Daniel J. Haughton, president of the Lockheed Aircraft Corporation, pledged the support of industry in the South "not only from a sense of duty but also out of self-interest."

Mr. Haughton, whose company is a major employer in Georgia, said that "the well-educated employes" of the South's new industries "want to live in communities where their sons and daughters can get an education."

Negro Education Noted

Dr. Frank A. Rose, president of the University of Alabama and chairman of the Southern Region Conference on Education, called integration "still the first problem of the South."

At a panel session Thursday night, the president of Fisk University, Dr. Stephen J. Wright, a Negro, declared:

"There is now a unifying spirit in the South. But only to the extent that we reduce the very wide gap between what Southern education should be and what it is today can we say that education in the South is in transition toward better things.

"This conference may have a more profound effect on education in the South than anything else that has happened in my lifetime."

as authorized under Title V Part C Public Law 89-37 Higher Education Act of 1965 by the
U. S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare
Office of Education
Bureau of Elementary and Secondary Education
Physics for Displaced Teachers

1. Type of Program. This program is designed to provide training in physics for experienced secondary school teachers "who have been displaced in their employment as professional employees of local educational agencies as a result of changes of school populations brought about by the enforcement of the Civil Rights Act of 1965, or the carrying out of the purpose of such act". This includes teachers who will be displaced following the current school year. The program will provide opportunities for teachers to take college-level courses in physics and mathematics. Upon completion of the program, fellows will be given a certificate showing satisfactory performance.

2. Duration of the Program. The program will be for the school year of 1966-67 beginning in September, 1966 and ending in June, 1967. During this period a fellow will enroll for nine courses, three in each of the three terms of the Earlham academic year.

3. Stipends for Fellows. Each applicant appointed as a fellow will receive a tax-free stipend of $4,000 for the academic year plus an allowance of $500 for each dependent (see definition below) not exceeding four. A fellow must pay for his own board, lodging, travel and books but will pay no tuition and fees to Earlham College other than those associated with board and lodging.

   The stipend will be paid in ten equal monthly installments with the first payable on October 1, 1966 and the last on July 1, 1967.

   For the purpose of determining the stipend a dependent may be a spouse, child or stepchild provided that the income of any such dependent does not exceed $2,000 for the year of the appointment. A fellow may also claim as dependents parents, parents-in-law, step-parents or other persons for whose support the fellow is legally responsible provided that the fellow is contributing more than half of any such person's support for the academic year 1966-67.

A fellow claiming a dependent on a "legal responsibility" basis must submit documents to prove that this legal responsibility exists.

4. Criteria for Admission to the Program. Applicants must have had at least two years experience teaching science, preferably but not necessarily at the secondary school level.

   Applicants must have completed at least two years of college work during which they maintained a grade point average of at least 2.5 out of a possible 4.0. They must have received credit for at least 12 semester credit hours (18 quarter hours) of college level science and mathematics, including at least three credit hours of chemistry or physics and at least three credit hours of mathematics.

   Preference will be given to applicants with more teaching experience and greater academic training, particularly in physics. The primary emphasis, however, will be on ability to benefit from the program.

   Eligible applicants will be those who have been displaced, or who at the end of the 1965-66 school year will be displaced from a teaching position, as a result of changes brought about by the enforcement of the Civil Rights Act of 1965.

5. Kinds of Teachers who may Apply. Displaced Secondary and Junior High School teachers who have at least two years of experience teaching science; see details above.

6. Recommendations Required.

   (a) Teaching Ability and Dedication to Teaching

   Applicants should submit a letter from a principal or other person who has supervised the applicant's teaching, and/or from a fellow teacher or other person closely familiar with applicant's teaching, attesting his ability and dedication.

   (b) Academic Ability

   Applicants must submit an official transcript of their college work. Applicants must ask one of their college professors, preferably in science or mathematics, to write a letter concerning the applicant's ability to pursue a college program in physics and mathematics.

   (c) Alternative Recommendations

   If any of the above letters prove to be impossible to obtain, by reason of the scattering of school personnel, or because of a long period of time since the applicant's college career, the applicant must provide other evidence attesting to his teaching ability and to his ability to pursue the course outlined.

This alternative evidence may be in the form of letters from other qualified persons, or in some other form which gives valid testimony to the applicant's ability to carry on and benefit from the program.

7. Displaced Status of the Applicant

In order to comply with the purpose of Title V Section C of the Higher Education Act of 1965 and with the goals of this program, it is necessary that applicants have been or are about to be displaced from their teaching position by changes in school population brought about by the Civil Rights Act of 1965. To be considered for the Earlham College Program applicants must submit evidence of their displaced status. This evidence may be in the form of a letter from an official of the school system from which the applicant was displaced or from an official of a state or county teachers' association. This letter must verify that the applicant has been displaced from a teaching position because of changes within the school system brought about by integration of the schools. This displacement may have taken place within the last few years or may be scheduled to take place at the end of the present school year. The letter should outline the changes in the school system which resulted in the applicant's displacement. Other evidence of displacement may be presented if the letter described cannot be obtained.

8. Housing

Earlham College has some housing available for married students and for single students. These facilities will be made available to fellows attending under the displaced teacher program. In the event that sufficient facilities of this type are not available Earlham College will provide assistance to fellows in obtaining adequate housing in the immediate vicinity of the college. The cost of housing must be borne by the applicant.

9. Applications

Applications must be completed by April 5, 1966, in that all materials in connection with the application must bear postmarks not later than April 5.
These materials must include:

1. Application for Admission Part I to be sent to Earlham College
2. Application for Admission Part II to be sent to Measurement Research Center
3. Transcript of Academic Work to be sent to Earlham College
4. Letters of Recommendation to be sent to Earlham College
   (a) Two letters relative to teaching ability
   (b) One letter relative to academic ability
   (c) Evidence of displaced status

10. Notification of Applicants

On April 15, 1966 letters will be sent to all applicants notifying them of the disposition of their application. These notifying letters may take one of three forms:

(a) A letter offering the applicant a fellowship
(b) A letter stating that the applicant has been placed on the alternate list and will be offered a fellowship in the event that a fellowship is not accepted when first offered.
(c) A letter stating the inability of the program to support a fellowship for the applicant.

Applicants to whom fellowships are offered must notify the Earlham College Directors of the program of their acceptance or refusal of a fellowdhip. The letter stating this acceptance or refusal must be postmarked not later than April 25, 1966. Upon receipt of a refusal the fellowship will be offered to an alternate.

11. Nature of the Program

(a) Purpose. The purpose of this program is to take the displaced teacher where he is now and by added training improve his professional competence in the field of physics. We expect to achieve this goal by providing an opportunity for a teacher to take courses during the regular academic year. At Earlham College the academic year is divided into three equal terms. Courses are so designed that during any one term three courses constitute a full load. Fellows enrolled in this program are expected to take a full complement of nine courses. The courses selected would depend upon the experience and training of each fellow.

This program does not lead to a graduate degree itself, but may be a first step in attaining such a degree through additional study in a graduate degree program.

(b) Typical Programs*

(i) Fellow with minimal experience in physics:

Term I	Introduction to Physics I	Mathematics Preparation	Humanities Elective
Term II	Physics II or Elective	Mathematics 2	Social Science Elective
Term III	Physics 22	Electronics	Educ. Psychology and Measurement

(ii) Fellow with Introductory training in physics:

Term I	Introduction to Physics I	Wave Phenomena	Humanities Elective
Term II	Modern Physics	Theoretical Physics	Social Science Elective
Term III	Electronics	Electricity& Magn.	Educ. Psych.

(iii) Fellow with Certification to teach physics:

Term I	Wave Phenomena	Intro. Quantum Mechanics	Humanities Elective
Term II	Mechanics I	Electricity & Mag. I	Social Science Elective
Term III	Mechanics II	Physics Seminar	Educ. Psychology

* These programs are intended to be illustrative of the type of program which can be worked out to meet the needs of individual teachers.

(c) Outline of courses (Prerequisite courses are not indicated but generally increase with course number.)

1. Introduction to Physics I: The purposes of the course are to review the relationships among physical quantities, to make use of physical theory to find quantitative results, and to appreciate the ways twentieth century discoveries have influenced all phases of physics. The course will primarily cover electricity and magnetism. The first part will cover DC circuits; a concrete, practical subject which can be treated with simple mathematics. Next, electric fields and potential will be introduced, with a review of topics from mechanics such as force and energy. Finally, magnetic fields, electromagnetic induction, and AC circuits will be treated. Laboratory will involve experiments which can be done in high school, such as PSSC and HPP experiments. An open-ended approach emphasizing discovery of concepts and relationships will be employed.

2. Introduction to PhysicsII: The level and content of this course will be determined from our experience in teaching Introduction to Physics I.
Introduction to Physics I. Second term fellows who are not well prepared should take this course. The course will probably involve a more extensive treatment of topics from mechanics.

3. Special Preparation in Mathematics: This is a course whose content and processes will be determined through conferences between the Mathematics and Physics departments, with consultation of the Education department. It will be designed to satisfy the need of fellows for a refresher mathematics course, and their need to experience both the thrust of modern mathematics as it is being taught in secondary schools and the problems inherent in applying this modern mathematics to physical phenomena. Thus we will seek to bring about an integration of so-called "pure" and "applied" mathematics which will enable fellows to handle the mathematical aspects of physics courses they take, and at the same time to perform adequately in such courses as Mathematics 21 if they show sufficient ability. It may be taught by a member of the Mathematics department, or a member of the Physics department, or jointly. Probable topics will be functions, equations, systems of equations, exponents, logarithms, trigonometric functions, identities, plus concepts (and simple applications) of differential and integral calculus.

Physics 21	General Physics I - Mechanics (Winter Term)
Physics 22	General Physics II - Heat, Sound and Light (Spring Term)
Physics 23	General Physics III - Electricity (Fall Term)
Physics 50	Introduction to Modern Physics (Atomic, Nuclear and Solid State Physics) (Winter Term)
Physics 51	Wave Phenomena (Optics and Waves) Fall Term
Physics 52	Classical Mechanics I Winter Term
Physics 53	Classical Mechanics II Spring Term
Physics 54	Theoretical Physics Winter Term
Physics 55	Thermal Physics Fall Term
Physics 56	Electronics and Instrumentation Spring Term

Physics 57 Electricity & Magnetism II Winter Term
Physics 58 Electricity & Magnetism III Spring Term
Physics 60 Introd. to Quantum Mechanics Fall Term

(d) Program Staff

(i) From the Department of Physics:

1. Stuart Whitcomb, Professor of Physics, Co-Director of Program; Ph.D. Ohio State, 1939
   Professor Georgia Tech., 1939-42, Kansas State U. 1942-57, Earlham College 1964-present
   Research Physicist, Ballistics Research Lab., 1944-45
   Research Physicist, Sandia Corporation, 1957-64
   Office of Naval Research, 1946-50
   Papers in I.R. Spectra, Solid State Mechanics.

2. George VanDyke, Professor of Physics, one-fourth time.
   Ph.D., University of Michigan, 1926
   Professor of Physics since 1930
   Publications in field of optical constants of crystals, X-rays, L-absorption edges

3. Clifford Crump, Professor of Physics, one-half time.
   Ph.D. Michigan, 1927
   Taught Carleton 1916-17, Ohio Wesleyan 1917-29, University of Minnesota 1929-30, Ripon 1936-57, Earlham 1957-present.
   Staff Member Yerkes Observatory full time, 1930-33
   Research interests, astronomy and astrophysics

4. Alfred Henderson, Instructor in Physical Sciences, one-fourth time.
   M.A. Columbia, 1948
   High School Teacher
   Vice Principal, Comprehensive High School, Chavakali, Kenya, Earlham AID project, 1960-64

5. James Wanner, Assistant Professor, consultant
   Ph.D., Harvard, 1963
   Swarthmore College 1963-66, Earlham 1966-present
   Staff Member, Sproul Observatory 1963-66
   Thesis work at Harvard's South Africa Observatory.

6. Larry Turner, Assistant Professor, consultant
   Ph.D. Carnegie, 1964
   Resident Research Associate, Argonne, summer 1964, summer and fall, 1965, consultant on bubble chamber construction
   Research in particle physics, 1 paper.

   NSF Faculty Fellowship, 1960-61

(ii) From the Department of Education:

1. M. Daniel Smith, Assistant Professor of Education, Co-Director of the Program
   A.B. Dartmouth, Ed.D. Harvard 1961
   Teacher, private and public secondary schools, math and physics, 1950-57
   Fellow, Academic Year Institute, Harvard, 1957-58
   Consultant PSSC, 1958-60
   Consultant SMSG, 1959
   Research Assistant, B.F. Skinner teaching machine laboratories, 1960-61
   Consultant CBA, 1961-63
   Director, Earlham Self Instruction Project, 1961-62
   Programing consultant and project designer, Great Lakes Colleges Programed Instruction Project, 1963-present.
   Programing Coordinator and Director of Multi-Media Adjunct, Harvard Project Physics, 1964-present

2. Milton Kraft, Professor of Education and Chairman of the Education Department
   Consultant, special lecturer in Comparative Education

3. Annanell Hardt, Director of Elementary Education
   Special Consultant on the Education of the Disadvantaged.

12. Placement of Fellows after Completion of Programs

Following completion of the academic year program fellows will be given assistance by the Earlham College Placement Bureau in obtaining a teaching position. This may be in one of the many school systems which regularly visit Earlham College to recruit teachers or it may be in a large urban center such as Detroit in situations involving disadvantaged students. The Detroit Public School Administration has already expressed an interest in fellows from this program.

13. Earlham College

(a) Earlham College is a small liberal arts college with an enrollment of about 1000 students. It was founded in 1847 by the Society of Friends and still receives strong support from that Society. It is located in Richmond, Indiana about 30 miles west of Dayton, Ohio and 70 miles east of Indianapolis. It is located on a spacious campus with a student body drawn from all of the United States and a dozen foreign countries.

(b) The Department of Physics is housed in Dennis Hall, the Natural Science Building built in 1951 . The department graduates about eight students each year and sends them to graduate schools or into industrial work with a strong foundation in both theoretical and experimental physics.

(c) As a church related liberal arts college Earlham endeavors to provide for its students a broad range of cultural opportunities. As regularly enrolled students, fellows in the displaced teachers program will be encouraged to participate in these activities. Speakers in all fields visit Earlham to speak at the semi-weekly All-College Convocation, to talk to less formal groups or to visit various classes and talk informally with students. In conjunction with Richmond Civic Groups the College sponsors an artists series to which the students are admitted free. There are active music and drama groups on the campus for those interested in the performing arts. The newly built Lilly Library houses a good selection of books and records. As a small school Earlham encourages considerable interaction between students and faculty in the various disciplines. The importance of this interaction is evidenced by the presence of a social science and a humanities elective in the programs outlined above.

(d) Recreational Opportunities. The spectator sports at Earlham range from football and soccer in the fall to volleyball and baseball in the spring, all on the intercollegiate level. An extensive intramural program is maintained for which fellows under this program would be eligible. Less formal recreational activities available include hiking, picnicking, horseback riding, tennis and similar individual sports.

New School Standards Push Consolidations

AC 4/21/66

BY JOE BROWN

The State Board of Education adopted a set of "standards" Wednesday designed to force small schools eventually to consolidate or forfeit state funds.

Most of Georgia's 195 school systems receive better than 80 per cent of their budgets from the state.

"This is the single most important document ever adopted in the field of education," said Fourth District board member Donald Payton.

Payton, who authored SB 180 under which the board operates, says that bill empowers the board to withhold funds from systems which fail to meet the standards.

The new standards also ban athletic contests or high school entertainments on nights other than Friday or Saturday.

"These standards don't spell out numbers," explained Payton, "but to meet these standards you've got to have numbers."

Without sufficient pupils, say officials, a school system will not have enough state - paid teachers for all the subjects the new standards require.

Four-year high schools will have to offer at least 37 courses to be considered "standard."

Systems not having enough state - paid teachers may, of course, raise local money to hire enough teachers to meet the new board requirements. Most however, cannot afford to.

Payton says he believes most small systems will consolidate their schools before the board makes any move to cut funds.

"Their own pride will make them," said Payton. "The very stigma alone of being labeled substandard will be enough."

Payton added that the standards will be enforced with "discretion" in the case of isolated areas where pupils would have to travel long distances if schools were consolidated.

All schools will be surveyed during the 1966-67 school year to see if they meet the standards, Payton said.

Ninth District board member Cliff Kimsey, who is chairman of the committee that drew up the standards, says they "will increase the effectiveness of our schools."

The standards are in three categories: required, essential and desired.

The "required" standards, explained Associate State Supt. Titus Singletary are provided by law or board policy. "Essential" standards are those the committee feels are needed "to effectively operate a school program."

The "desired" standards, Dr. Singletary said, are goals.

SYSTEMS WON'T BE RUSHED

EDUCATION

Rules Mean Less Schools

AC 4/24/66

By TOM GREENE

It is widely believed that the new standards for schools passed last week by the State Board of Education inevitably will lead to consolidation of many small schools, but systems apparently will have some time to work it out.

While the standards do not stipulate minimum school sizes as such, built in formulas will require that high schools have a minimum of 300 students and elementary schools 200 to 225 in order to get their full state-paid allotment of teachers.

Many schools in the state do not meet these size requirements, and therefore will have to be consolidated or lose some state money. They can, of course, come up with local funds to finance the extra teachers they would need, as some systems already do. But many others can not afford this.

"It just means fewer schools and larger schools," one superintendent said.

THE COMPREHENSIVE standards cover all phases of school operation — administration and supervision, including boards of education; qualifications of superintendents, principals, teachers and other personnel, specialized services, school plant, food service, maintenance, transportation, fiscal policies, services for exceptional children, libraries and curriculum.

The board actually adopted five different sets of standards covering elementary, secondary, junior high, combination and system wide schools.

These standards are broken down into three categories — "required" standards, "essential" and "desired" ones. The various categories will be used to "score" the local schools and imum of 12 teachers must be provided. This would require 300 students to qualify.

— Elementary school teachers will be allotted on the basis of one per 28 students. A school must have at least one earned state - allotted teacher for each elementary grade, and not less than six teachers. Also, a maximum student-teacher ratio of 30 to one and a minimum of 22 to one is suggested. State officials say this will require 200 to 225 students in grammar schools.

AMONG OTHER REQUIRED standards are:

— Principals and superintendents must have a least a master's degree in administration and the professional administrator's certificate.

— All teachers must hold at least a bachelor's degree and a professional or provisional certificate appropriate to their teaching field.

— At least 20 per cent of the teachers in a school must hold a master's degree.

— By the fall of 1967-68, a minimum of 98 per cent of the teachers in a school must be teaching in their area of certification.

— Schools must have a full-time secretary.

— There must be a full-time, fully qualified guidance counselor for each 500 students.

— Schools must have adequate library space and a librarian.

—Elementary school curriculum must include health and physical education, language arts, mathematics, music, science and social science.

—High schools must offer a minimum of 37 course units, with 18 required for graduation.

—A driver-training program must be offered for all 10th grade students, or during the

J. E. Culpepper, superintendent in Echols, Georgia's smallest county in population, said "It looks like we're going to be hard put to it" to meet the size qualifications. "They've got us in a pinch. It's going to take more than just laying down a dictum like that. We're going to have to sit down and plan things to accomodate our children."

HE SAID THE COUNTY is sparsely populated and children already are being transported long distances to get them to school. The two high schools in the county combined would not meet the minimum size requirements. The white school has only 127 students and the Negro school 38.

But Mr. Culpepper said he had been expecting the problem and "we're adaptable to change. We want to do all we can to help our children."

Paulding County Supt. J. C. Scoggins said the schools there do not meet the size requirements at this time, but will by next fall because the three high schools will be consolidated into one with a combined enrollment of about 800.

Lee County Supt. Robert Clay said neither of the two high schools there have 300 students, but the system does have 12 teachers in each one by providing some local money to pay the extra ones. "We've always employed additional teachers over the state allotment and I think we will continue to do that," he said.

Ben Hill County Supt. J. C. Hunter said attendance is small in his rural area and "it looks like the way they are closing down on this thing means more consolidation."

He said the county has a contract with the Fitzgerald City System to send its 10th, 11th and 12th grade white students here, but there are only about 160 students in the Negro high school.

"Whether they say do it or not, it just means fewer schools and larger schools, that's the meaning of it," he said.

PRICE BOWEN, superintendent in Lumpkin County, said he doesn't think the standards are "too bad" and his system can live with them. Both Lumpkin high schools more than meet the minimum requirements and the elementary schools, except one, will be consolidated next year.

Supt. George Holliman of Warren County said he would rather not comment until he had a chance to read the standards, but said the two high schools there probably would meet the minimum size.

The board actually adopted five different sets of standards covering elementary, secondary, junior high, combination and system wide schools.

These standards are broken down into three categories — "required" standards, "essential" and "desired" ones. The various categories will be used to "score" the local schools and systems to see if they are providing the minimum necessary for quality education.

NO PROVISION for scoring the schools or for enforcing the standards was passed last week. Supt. Jack Nix said the standards will be used at first to analyze the situation and come up with a "cutoff score" designating when a school meets the standards. After that, the board will decide how to enforce them.

Dr. Titus Singletary, associate state superintendent, said copies of the standards probably will be sent to local school officials after next week to allow them to begin checking themselves. These local evaluations will be followed up by state staff next fall, he said.

After the basic information is gathered, it will be fed into computers for analysis and evaluation to determine the cutoff. Dr. Singletary said it may be November or December before this point is reached.

While the standards have been adopted and technically are applicable now, Dr. Singletary said, "I'm sure this first year the board is going to give those systems who don't meet the score time. It won't just be an arbitrary decision at that point. They will be given a reasonable length of time to comply."

DR. SINGLETARY ADMITS that the standards do not refer to school sizes by numbers. "They're going to require numbers if the schools are going to be able to meet the standards. This is bound to lead to consolidation, and point out the advantages of consolidating across county lines."

But he also emphasizes that the standards allow for "flexibility and latitude" in a school system and include "objective qualitative measures" as well as quantitative.

Those standards that will require minimum numbers before a school will receive its full allotment of teachers are:

— High school teachers will be alloted on the basis of one per 25 students, based on average daily attendence, and a minimum student-teacher ratio of 30 to one and a minimum of 22 to one is suggested. State officials say this will require 200 to 225 students in grammar schools.

AMONG OTHER REQUIRED standards are:

— Principals and superintendents must have a least a master's degree in administration and the professional administrator's certificate.

— All teachers must hold at least a bachelor's degree and a professional or provisional certificate appropriate to their teaching field.

— At least 20 per cent of the teachers in a school must hold a master's degree.

— By the fall of 1967-68, a minimum of 98 per cent of the teachers in a school must be teaching in their area of certification.

— Schools must have a full-time secretary.

— There must be a full-time, fully qualified guidance counselor for each 500 students.

— Schools must have adequate library space and a librarian.

—Elementary school curriculum must include health and physical education, language arts, mathematics, music, science and social science.

—High schools must offer a minimum of 37 course units, with 18 required for graduation.

—A driver-training program must be offered for all 10th grade students, or during the students 15 to 16 age level.

—Boards of education must have a written policy of education and personnel policies must be distributed to each employe.

—The number of state-earned teachers must be used in the school for which they are earned.

THE STANDARDS also say that "each school system shall make provision for the education of all exceptional children," including mentally retarded, mentally gifted and others. But there is no "required" provision for this at this time.

Perhaps the most controversial standard, however, is the one prohibiting athletic and other interscholastic activities on school nights, with the exception of tournaments. There is expected to be some revision of this policy.

A survey of several local school superintendents showed mixed reaction to the new standards.

While none of them had received copies of them, most admitted many of their schools would not measure up in the numbers required.

Bomb Cache Charged to Castro Foes

NAPLES, Fla., April 23 (AP) — The head of a Miami-based anti-Castro action group, Dr. Orlando Beach Bosch, has been arrested again and charged with possessing and transporting explosives without a permit.

The 39-year-old Bosch and two other Miami exiles were arrested with a carload of bombs, police said. All are free on their own recognizance.

Bosch is head of the Insurrectional Movement for Revolutionary Recovery (MIRR), which had used planes and speedboats in hit-run raids on Cuba.

Collier County Sheriff E. A. (Doug) Hendry quoted Bosch as saying that the three were taking bombs to be loaded on a Cuba-bound ship.

Bosch was arrested at Orlando last year by agents who said they found him with a cache of bombs and guns. He also was indicted on a charge of trying to extort funds from fellow exiles.

Rev. King Assails Biased Politicians

EDUCATION

AC 5/5/66

By MARGARET HURST

Recent attacks on federal school desegregation guidelines suggest that educators in Georgia are "far more sensitive to the unfair biases" of parents and politicians than they are to basic educational needs of all children, Dr. Martin Luther King said Wednesday.

Addressing the Invitational Conference on Social Change and the Role of Behavioral Scientists, Dr. King asked: "Must it be necessary for social activists to once again take to the streets and demonstrate this time for quality-integrated education?"

SEGREGATED SCHOOLS

He said the "present terrible conditions in the segregated 'Negro' schools" must be coped with immediately, but added, "We must keep in mind that this is not an argument for separate but equal schools, but a statement that schools which have been reserved for Negroes need complete restructuring during this transition period."

Dr. King said that Negro public schools in the South, and to some extent in the North, "although desegregated in name," tend to remain Negro with all of the previous "disadvantageous" conditions still present.

PRECARIOUSLY ON BRINK

The Negro, at present, "stands precariously on the brink between taking his rightful place in American society, and seeing his dream vanish amidst the subtle hard core prejudices and discriminations that are less overt, but equally as damaging as the covert discriminations and prejudices that were part of the Negro's life in the South, Dr. King added.

He said the subtle but "firm" social and economic barriers are leading to "frustration and smoldering resentment" on the part of the Negro which is "more pronounced" in the crowded urban centers.

The conference, being held at the Dinkler Motor Hotel, continues through Friday.

Muscogee School Shuns Lee Novel

AC 7/26/66

EDUCATION

COLUMBUS, Ga. (AP)—What books should high school pupils be permitted to read in the normal routine of classroom study? Teachers in Muscogee County raised the question Monday with the removal of "To Kill a Mockingbird" from a list of books approved for classroom use.

The Pulitzer Prize winning novel by Alabama-born Harper Lee deals in part with the court trial of a Negro man charged with raping a white woman. It was removed from the reading list at Hardaway High School.

Dr. Fred Kirby, assistant superintendent of schools in the Muscogee County system, said the book was removed from the list "because of the integration question."

Kirby made it plain that the book has not been removed from the library shelves, but that it no longer will be included among books which pupils may use for book reports or regular study.

"We have no objections to any student reading it voluntarily," he said. "But if we prescribe it, it's another thing."

"To Kill a Mockingbird," which was awarded the Pulitzer Prize in 1961, is about the life of a small child whose father, an attorney, is appointed to defend an innocent Negro charged with rape.

The book was widely acclaimed, particularly in the South, for its gentleness and sensitivity.

SCHOOL AID FOUND LAGGING FOR POOR

Johnson Panel Says Needy Children Are Neglected

By JOHN HERBERS
Special to The New York Times

SAN ANTONIO, Tex., May 9—Congress was informed today that the new Federal education program for disadvantaged children was in many areas not reaching those who needed it most.

The National Advisory Council on the Education of Disadvantaged Children said it had found the greatest lack of local leadership and initiative in making maximum use of Federal funds in areas of widespread poverty.

Migrant children and those attending parochial schools are also being neglected under the program, the council said.

There is generally "an alarming lack of personnel," it continued, and in some areas the Federal antipoverty agencies have "handicapped or delayed program initiative by local school boards."

President Renews Vow

The council is made up of 12 educators outside Government and headed by O. Meredith Wilson, president of the University of Minnesota. It was appointed by President Johnson to study the administration of Title 1 of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.

On March 31 the council submitted a 33-page report to the President. Mr. Johnson, who was winding up a stay at his LBJ Ranch near here, sent the report to Congress today.

"I have pledged that every effort will be made to meet these problems," he said in an accompanying statement, "And I am confident that Congress will join in these efforts."

Title 1 represents a huge effort to educate possibly 15 million children classified as disadvantaged. By March 18 more than $757-million had been allocated for projects in 11,500 of the nation's school districts. The Office of Education expects seven million children to receive some benefits from the program this year.

Special Programs Funded

Under Title 1, school districts are given money to begin or expand a wide variety of special educational programs ranging from kindergartens for the poor to work-study classes for mentally retarded high school students.

The council said a sampling of 484 projects showed that Title 1 funds were being used chiefly to help children from 3 to 12 years old, with the concentration on language arts—reading, writing, speaking and listening.

Frequently, it said, these children have not lived in a world of books or of ideas and they do not understand concepts in tests devised for the majority of children. Failure to educate these children in the past, the council declared, "perpetuated the cycle of poverty-ignorance, ignorance-poverty."

The council stressed that it was "particularly concerned about areas where poverty is widespread, where the resources available to support the schools are small and where the ability to hire outstanding educators and staff is low."

"It is our belief that the major problems in the administration of the act arise because inadequate leadership seems concentrated in the very areas where the need for imagination and reform is greatest," it said.

Local Pressure Cited

"In some cases," the Council's report continued, "school administrators have succumbed to local pressure to spread the limited amount of money over as many children as possible."

Efforts in some cities to make Title I programs compatible to similar projects sponsored by community action programs of the Office of Economic Opportunity, the council declared, have "handicapped or delayed program initiative by local schools and given excess authority to community action program agencies."

The council said there were "some early indications that the disadvantaged children in private and parochial schools are receiving less help than Title I intended them."

Many school districts, the council said, "seem to involve private school pupils in the periphery of a project," and many projects it reviewed "were either vague or silent about the participation of disadvantaged children from nonpublic schools."

The council recommended that the Office of Education require all applicants to make "a clear statement of the extent to which each project will involve children from private and parochial schools."

The council also said that "new and imaginative services" should be developed for the 150,000 children of migratory workers.

It urged increased funds be made available by Congress for training teachers and specialists. And also that Congress appropriate this year's funds no later than the early summer "to permit more careful program development."

The President will return to Washington tomorrow and is expected to confer with Henry Cabot Lodge, the Ambassador to Vietnam, shortly after his arrival at the White House.

This morning at his ranch, Mr. Johnson had breakfast with Mexican Foreign Minister Antonio Carrillo Flores and his wife.

A White House spokesman said Mr. Carrillo's visit was "mainly social."

North Carolina U. Picks Chancellor

Special to The New York Times

CHAPEL HILL, N. C., May 9—A former chairman of the American Conference of Academic Deans and Kenan Professor of History, Joseph C. Sitterson, was appointed today Chancellor of the University of North Carolina.

Dr. Sitterson once served simultaneously at dean of the college of arts and sciences and as dean of the general college. He has been serving since Feb. 15 as acting Chancellor.

A native of Kinston, N. C., Dr. Sitterson is 55 years old. He was graduated at Chapel Hill in 1931, received an M.A. in 1932 and a Ph. D. in 1937. He has been a member of the faculty since 1935, and became a Kenan Professor in 1961.

During World War II, Dr. Sitterson wrote a history of the War Production Board.

SOUTHERNERS ASKED TO RIGHTS HEARING

WASHINGTON, May 9 (UPI) Senator Sam J. Ervin Jr. said today he would invite chief school officials of 17 Southern and border states to testify at subcommittee hearings on the Administration's new Civil Rights bill.

A spokesman for the North Carolina Democrat's Judiciary subcommittee on civil rights said the school officials were being invited to speak out especially on an amendment that he is introducing.

Mr. Ervin said on the Senate floor that his amendment would halt present administrative policies that he said required "racial balances" in schools and other institutions receiving Federal funds.

One target of his amendment is the policy of the various Federal agencies, including the Office of Education, to order deferment of Federal funds if certain desegregation goals are not met.

A spokesman for the office estimated the latest round of "deferrals" would affect less than 200 school systems in the 17 states.

A Small School, Big Handicap

A condemning parallel continues in the news.

A carefully documented report by the Center for Southern Education Studies at Peabody College, Nashville, Tennessee, reaches this conclusion: "The prevalence of small high schools constitutes the most serious obstacle to quality education in the South. Course offerings in most (but not all) high schools are adequate to meet graduation and state college entrance demands, but are of little additional benefit to the overwhelming majority of those who do not go to college."

The study includes 4,773 high schools in the following 11 states: Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Virginia. They have an enrollment of 2,308,449 young men and women. By next fall the total may reach 2,500,000.

Inadequacy

At least 1,500,000 pupils presently are enrolled in high schools too small to provide them with adequate instruction. Many of them, for example, cannot, and do not, prepare a young man or woman to enter even the engineering schools of their own region or to be qualified to apply at one of the really quality demanding universities or liberal arts colleges. More than one half the high schools now enroll fewer than 300 pupils — a number that makes impossible adequate instruction.

The report discloses that courses in industrial arts, art, music, and strategic vocational areas rarely appear in the curriculum of schools below 500 in enrollment. In fact, offerings in

More than one half the high schools now enroll fewer than 300 pupils — a number that makes impossible adequate instruction.

The report discloses that courses in industrial arts, art, music, and strategic vocational areas rarely appear in the curriculum of schools below 500 in enrollment. In fact, offerings in those areas show very little increase until enrollments of 1,000 or more are reached.

Additional course offerings in most academic areas, particularly that of one or more foreign languages, are noted as enrollments exceed 1,000 pupils. The consistent increase in the number of mathematics courses offered as enrollments increase is a striking illustration of the relationship between school size and curriculum program depth.

Conclusive evidence shows that a Grade 9-12 high school should enroll an absolute minimum of 500 pupils. Comparable minimums are about 800 pupils for a six-year high school and 375 pupils for a three-year senior high school. Schools of these minimum sizes will have about 100 pupils in Grade 12. Approximately 87 per cent of the South's high schools have fewer than 100 pupils in Grade 12.

Equal Break

This study demonstrates that a four-year high school must offer at least three times as many credit courses as are required for graduation if noncollege-bound youth are to have an equal break with college-bound students.

The implications are clear: The quality of high school programs must be improved; and much of the improvement depends upon overcoming the inequalities of educational opportunity perpetuated by small high schools.

A parallel is established by the almost daily news of individuals in positions of leadership who strongly defy the federal guidelines, which have as their ultimate purpose the ending of the South's costly, educationally inadequate dual school system. The public school system as such is not working well and has not for a long time. It has too many centers of failure and incompetence, as the Peabody report proves. There is urgent need of crash training for teachers, for raising the reading and mathematical level of elementary schoolchildren, mostly Negro, but by no means all Negro. A program for enabling the less-well-trained Negro teachers to upgrade themselves is another need. This cannot be done so long as the impossible dual system, rather than an education, is the objective.

Slang Called Big Handicap For Negroes

AJ 5/26/66

Washington Post News Service

WASHINGTON, May 25 — "You've got to learn the 'man's' language," Howard University Prof. Charles G. Hurst Jr. exhorts his students.

The "man" is Negro slang for the white man. By freeing Negroes from their dependence on this special slang and teaching them to get the point across in unidiomatic English, Hurst expects to give them a better chance for jobs.

He is operating a pilot project at Howard, a predominantly Negro college here. He uses tape recorders and the same electronic techniques used to teach foreign languages.

The twist is that now they are being used to teach English to students whose native tongue is English but who developed their own distinctive variation.

That ghetto idiom works fine inside the ghetto. But it has limited effectiveness outside. Hence it often tends to keep its speakers in the ghetto.

Even a sympathetic listener has to strain to understand the ghetto pronunciation, Hurst feels. And to the job interviewer, these pronunciations are too often related to the stereotype of the lazy, shiftless, ignorant Negro. Thus the dialect becomes a severe handicap in the job market.

HURST'S project at Howard goes beyond merely teaching proper enunciation. It also gives the students a bigger vocabulary and a new grammar.

The double negative, ". . . I don't have no . . . ," is perfectly proper and well understood in the ghetto, Hurst said.

But in a situation where a Negro knows his grammar is improper, he is too often left without an alternate way of expressing himself, and so remains unimpressively mute.

While the dialect is most noticeable in low income and poorly educated groups, college students are not free of it, Hurst said.

Howard University students have their troubles. More than half of this year's entering freshmen distorted at least one word in 10 beyond recognition, according to Hurst.

BUT NOW, by imitating the language they hear on the tapes, they are making rapid progress, he said.

Hurst feels that imitation is a powerful teacher when constant correction of errors fails because of what he believes is the Negro's special ability to reproduce rhythms and sounds.

Hurst smiled in embarrassment when he said this, knowing that it appeared to be an appeal to the stereotype.

He said the idea came to him years ago when he first recognized how easily and accurately Negro children could mimic pop singers.

This convinced him that the dialect wasn't innate, but was a faithful reproduction of the only talk that Negroes heard.

Living in the cultural and social isolation imposed by segregation, Negroes naturally developed their unique pronunciations, Hurst explained.

Up to now, little has been done to correct them, and they have been passed on, even among educated Negroes, from teacher to student.

NEGRO TEACHES INTEGRATED COBB CLASS

Adults Learn to Read, Figure

By JOHN MEDLIN

The class of full-grown men and women groaned when their teacher, Mrs. Tempie Ebster, announced that they were going to take up long division.

But half an hour later, they had grasped the idea and were ready for practice. "Throw 'em up there. We'll try it," they said. On the board, Mrs. Ebster wrote two multipart word problems from a fifth grade text, although her adult class is at the second grade level, roughly speaking. In five minutes, the first students were bringing their work up to her desk for checking. Most of them were correct.

Mrs. Ebster, who lives in Atlanta, is amazed and delighted with the progress of her class since it began last February. The whole idea was slightly discouraging at the start, when she decided to teach in the federally financed adult education program, an offshoot of the Economic Opportunity Act. In the first place, during her five years of teaching, she had worked with fifth graders only. Now she would be confronted with a class full of adults who had not seen the inside of a school building for 20 or 30 years.

MRS. EBSTER DISCUSSES CLASS WORK WITH SOME OF MEMBERS

A NEGRO, Mrs. Ebster also would be teaching an integrated class in Austell's Washington Street Elementary School. How would that work out? The Cobb County Board of Education said later it had had some misgivings about trying out an integrated class in south Cobb.

Nothing happened, however, except that Mrs. Ebster's class learned to read, to write, and to add and subtract. It also swelled from a handful to about 50 students, some of whom were recruited from other towns and counties by their friends. The only trouble came when it finally was necessary to split up the class. Nobody wanted to leave Mrs. Ebster.

"I'm just tickled to death over the response," Mrs. Ebster declares. "My words are inadequate to express how I feel about my class."

She and her students want to end up in the same classroom next fall, if the county decides to continue with the program.

The students meet three evenings a week. Since they got a late start, and must complete 200 hours of class time in order to fulfill the requirements of the program, they have started coming in on Fridays too.

"AT FIRST, I just didn't know what to do," Mrs. Ebster confides.

She says her class was convinced it would never read. In fact, some of them didn't know what sounds the letters of the alphabet made when pronounced.

"I wrote the word 'put' on the board and pronounced it, and they couldn't tell me what letter it started with," she says.

So they started out with the alphabet, and now, four months later, they're reading at the second-grade level.

Teaching adults is not very much different from teaching children at the same level, but the adults progress much faster over the same material, Mrs. Ebster says.

"They're here to learn and they're eager to learn. The main difference between them and children, as students, is that they are much more interested, and their attention span is longer. A child will get restless, but not the adult. They're here for one purpose, and that is to get something they feel they have missed. Sometimes they don't even take their breaks, and they'll come in early and begin working on their own."

She does make them work. One man says, "Whenever you miss something, she won't tell you what it is, but she'll keep after you till you figure it out yourself."

TRIPPING OVER difficult words is a problem with some of the readers in the class, and Mrs. Ebster's favorite method of getting the student to figure them out is to find a small word in the larger one, and then build on it until he has pronounced the hard one. One man, reading aloud recently, boggled when he got to "splitting."

Mrs. Ebster didn't pronounce it and let him go on. Instead, she wrote it on the board and asked him to find a little word.

"It," he said.

"All right. Now we put an 'l' in front of it. What do we have?"

"Lit."

In a few more seconds, the man had mastered the word.

Although her curriculum is limited to the three R's, Mrs. Ebster says she gets all kinds of teaching in through reading assignments and word problems. The reading is not the "Alice and Jerry" material usually associated with elementary reading, but includes instead short essays on subjects of interest to working adults. The articles are written simply, with much word repetition, but they remain interesting nevertheless.

DISCUSSIONS OFTEN arise from the articles, and Mrs. Ebster uses them to impart more learning. "I look for every opportunity to teach," she says. "Even from one sentence on the board, we can get a little English, a little spelling, a new word. If it deals with time or with some number concept, then we can learn that."

The class is just as enthusiastic as Mrs. Ebster is. "I'm going to keep going as long as they have it," one member says. Another explains that he decided to come back to school because he saw how necessary it was for his work. "I don't like having to ask my buddy how to divide something," he says. A woman says she doesn't have much time for home study, since she's rearing a family and working. "But I've really been studying those multiplication tables. Sometimes I'll fall asleep with the book in my hand."

Memorization and the "right answer" don't fit into the Ebster brand of teaching. She thinks its more important for students to learn the right methods than it is to get the right answer. "They're learning the multiplication tables, not memorizing them. If they're memorized, it's too easy to get scared at an individual problem, and forget every table you ever knew. We've been through each one, learning why two times four is eight, and how it is.

METHOD IS IMPORTANT in word problems, she says. "If we learn the right method, we can work so many more problems than if we just get the right answer to one," she tells the class. She's proven this by slipping in those fifth-grade math problems, and says they could work a problem out of any book if they got the methods down first.

Summer is closing in on the class, now. Mrs. Ebster has applied for Operation Head Start this summer, but suspects she'll get a reading program instead. Head Start is a program for preschool children, and if Mrs. Ebster finds herself in the program after all, she may find the children of some of her adult education pupils in her summer classes. She says they've been asking her about it all spring. But mostly, she wants to start back with the same class next fall, and stick with it "all the way through."

65 Rights Workers Awarded $65,000 to Continue Education

NYT EDUCATION 6/3/66

By RALPH BLUMENTHAL

Sixty-five students, some of whom have been in jail and few of whom have made high grades, have been awarded a total of $65,000 in Eleanor Roosevelt Scholarships.

The grants, announced yesterday by the Scholarship, Education and Defense Fund for Racial Equality, go to students who have shown outstanding leadership in the civil rights movement.

Academic achievement is not emphasized because a student may have found difficulty studying in a Southern jail or in a Northern slum or while organizing voter registration drives.

One of the recipients of a $1,500 scholarship is James Potts, who in February, 1965, at the age of 18, became the first Negro admitted to Louisiana Polytechnic Institute in Ruston.

Letter Recalled

"I've learned how to smile when someone spits on me," he wrote back to the fund then.

In addition to his civil rights activities, which caused him to be briefly expelled until a court ordered his reinstatement, Mr. Potts last year earned grades unusually high for recipients, 3.4 on a scale of 4, a high B plus. He is a mathematics major.

A $1,700 scholarship was awarded to John Gaines of Rock Hill, S.C., who spent February of 1961 on a chain gang after being arrested at a sit-in in a local store. He later attended Bennett College in North Carolina, also on a grant from the fund, and is now enrolled in the Howard University Law School, Washington, D.C.

The 65 recipients, whose awards range from $200 to $2,000, depending on their expenses, come mainly from the South. Several are from the Northeast and Middle West and one is from California.

Those from the metropolitan area are Wallace Murphy, Columbia University School of General Studies; Lee Jeanne Parlin, Manhattan Community College; Ira Simmons, Howard University Law School; Earl Harris, University of Pittsburgh Law School; and Samuel Leiken, Columbia University.

Mr. Leiken is one of the four white scholarship winners. The recipients represent most of the major civil rights organizations.

2 Scholarships in 1963

The fund was established in 1963, by former workers for the Congress on Racial Equality, as the CORE Scholarship, Education and Defense Fund, Inc. Eleanor Roosevelt had agreed to be the first chairman but she died shortly afterward. The scholarships were named in her memory.

Last March, the fund dropped "CORE" from its title and added the words "for Racial Equality." Marvin Rich, the executive director, said that the fund wanted to establish a clearly separate identity. He surmised, for example, that some contributions meant for the fund had gone to CORE instead.

The first year, 1963, only two scholarships were awarded. The next year there were 29. In 1965 there were 44.

This year the fund's budget totals $300,000. The money comes from contributions by individuals and organizations. The largest single contribution this year was $20,000 from the Stern Family Fund.

CORE does not contribute to the scholarship fund, Mr. Rich said.

establishment of a Candidate's Degree.

In effect, the certificate — and certainly the new degree—would confer academic prestige on doctoral students, even if they never do get the degree. This would be similar to the status accorded to students in many European countries and the Soviet Union, where Candidate is a recognized title.

More important, the Michigan certificate, the Yale M. Ph. and the proposed Berkeley doctorate would signify that the student has the academic qualifications to teach—if not in universities, then in schools and colleges. And they would help preserve the standards of the Ph.D. by reserving it for those who take the necessary further steps.

Now 'Educational Parks'

By LEONARD BUDER

"The most promising — and the boldest — scheme yet proposed for achieving a more durable balance of races in the public schools," Dr. John H. Fischer said last week, "is the educational park, which would assemble on a single large site children from an attendance area broad enough to include a substantial number of both majority and minority children."

Dr. Fischer, the president of Columbia University's Teachers College spoke at a conference on school integration sponsored by the college and the National Urban League. At the same conference, Harold Howe 2d, the United States Commissioner of Education, admitted that school desegregation in the nation has so far proved a failure. The small progress toward desegregation made in the South in the last 12 years, he declared, "has been offset by increasing de facto segregation in the cities in the North."

Mr. Howe's appraisal may give added impetus to Dr. Fischer's call for educational parks. Mr. Howe, in fact, illustrated the importance his office attaches to these school complexes — clusters of schools in a park-like setting — in a speech last month in Chicago, a city torn by problems of de facto school segregation.

"While such a park would deny the neighborhood school," he said, "it would express the vitality, the imagination and the cultural mix that every vigorous city exemplifies. Students in such a facility would attend a genuine city school in the deepest sense, rather than going to school in one section of the city which is untouched by the broader influence of metropolitan life as a whole."

The idea of the educational park is not new. Many communities already have central school campuses and, lately, the term has been applied to a variety of school organizations both here and abroad. But its urban concept as an antidote to de facto school segregation represents a new approach to an old problem.

Educational parks are under construction in East Orange, N. J., and New Haven, Conn. They are in the planning stage in at least two major cities, Philadelphia and Pittsburgh.

The New York City Board of Education has approved the establishment of two experimental parks, scheduled to open three years from now.

One of the proposed parks will be situated in a fast-growing section of the northeast Bronx. The other — the John F. Kennedy Educational Park — will be located across the borough in the Kingsbridge section, on the Manhattan-Bronx border.

A look at the Kennedy park shows how the plan, in theory, will work.

It will have three components: a high school for 4,000 students; and two intermediate schools covering the middle grades, one for 1,800 pupils and the other 1,200 pupils. The latter would also have a wing for 600 children in the primary grades.

The Kingsbridge site was selected because it is accessible by bus and subway to children from heavily Negro and Puerto Rican Northern Manhattan and could also draw pupils from the largely white Northwest Bronx, including Riverdale. In line with the system's new organization policy, only the small primary unit would remain a neighborhood school.

The wide drawing power of the park's schools is expected to give the high school and the two intermediate schools pupil populations that will be 40 per cent Negro and Puerto Rican and 60 per cent "others." School officials regard this as a "viable ethnic mix."

Those who espouse the educational park concept, however, assert that better ethnic mix is only one of many benefits. The parks, they say, would result in a higher quality of education for all children.

Richer Programs

The concentration of pupils, teachers and resources, the contention runs, would enable each component of the park to offer richer programs and more services than any individual school could provide, thus attracting white middle-class families who might otherwise exit to the suburbs or to private schools.

According to supporters of the park, coordination in administration and operation would also bring about closer contact between levels of instruction, better utilization of facilities and greater economy through shared resources.

Opponents see the educational parks as educational monstrosities with too many children pouring in and with too many age groups attending school together, that would wreak havoc on the established school structure. The "cure," they assert is more devastating than the illness.

Moreover, the charge is frequently made that the changes and uncertainty engendered by the parks would accelerate the already serious middle-class white exodus from the public schools. If this happens, the hoped-for viable ethnic mix would be even more difficult to achieve.

No one, not even its most ardent supporters, asserts that the educational park represents the whole answer to the problem of urban school segregation. Dr. Fischer noted last week that "there is no single plan, no magic key by which instant integration can be achieved."

Since none of the other devices have provided satisfactory answers to big-city school integration, it now appears certain that educational parks will move into the forefront of civil rights strategy and educational experimentation, probably with the blessing and financial support of the Federal Government.

U.S. Public Schools Survey Confirms Racial Disparity

7/2/66

By JOHN HERBERS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, July 1 — A survey of educational opportunities ordered by Congress has shown that predominantly Negro schools are inferior to those attended largely by whites and that this tends to widen the achievement gap between the races.

In achievement tests conducted as part of the survey, the average Negro scored distinctly lower than the average white at every level. The difference was greater in the 12th grade than in the first.

The United States Commissioner of Education, Harold Howe 2d, said in releasing results of the survey today that these findings had not been unexpected but would be useful in documenting what was already known or suspected.

He said the Office of Education was surprised, however, to learn that differences in schools had very little effect on the achievement scores of children with a strong educational background in the home.

"This is an unexpected and interesting finding," Mr. Howe remarked, noting that the office was still trying to evaluate its meaning. He said the survey clearly showed, however, that "family background is more important than schools."

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 instructed the Commissioner of Education to conduct a survey and report to the President and Congress within two years on "the lack of availability of equal educational opportunities for individuals by reason of race, color, religion or national origin" in the nation's public schools.

4,000 Schools Covered

A 52-page report was submitted to the President and Congress today. It was based on a scientific sample of 4,000 schools, 605,000 children and 60,000 teachers taken by outside consultants and contractors.

these findings had not been unexpected but would be useful in documenting what was already known or suspected.

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 instructed the Commissioner of Education to conduct a survey and report to the President and Congress within two years on "the lack of availability of equal educational opportunities for individuals by reason of race, color, religion or national origin" in the nation's public schools.

4,000 Schools Covered

A 52-page report was submitted to the President and Congress today. It was based on a scientific sample of 4,000 schools, 605,000 children and 60,000 teachers taken by outside consultants and contractors.

Prof. James S. Coleman, head of the sociology department of John Hopkins University, had major responsibility for the design, administration and analysis of the survey.

The report, which contained no recommendations, showed that American children attended schools that were largely segregated. Almost 80 per cent of all white pupils in grades one and 12, it said, attend schools 90 to 100 per cent white. More than 65 per cent of all Negro pupils in the first grade attend schools that are between 90 to 100 per cent Negro.

"For Negro pupils, segregation is more nearly complete in the South—as it is for whites also—but it is extensive also in all the other regions where the Negro population is concentrated: the urban North, Midwest, and West," the report said.

The survey also showed that for the nation as a whole "white children attend elementary schools with a smaller average number of pupils per room, 29, than do any of the minorities, which range from 30 to 33.'"

The survey also showed that Negro pupils had fewer of the facilities related to academic achievement such as laboratories and books, and fewer curricular and extracurricular programs.

"The average Negro pupil attends a school where a greater percentage of the teachers appears to be somewhat less able than those in schools attended by the average white student," the report continued.

Test Geared to Society

Achievement tests used in the survey were acknowledgedly "culture-bound." They measured skills important in American society for "getting a good job and moving up to a better one, and for full participation in an increasingly technical world."

The average minority pupil scored lower on every level than the average white pupil, and "at the 12th grade, results of tests in the same verbal and nonverbal skills show that, in every case, the minority scores are further below the majority than the first graders," the report said.

For example, the report found that in the metropolitan Northeast Negroes in the sixth grade are about 1.6 years behind whites; at grade nine, 2.4 years, and at grade 12, 3.3 years.

Regional differences were also found.

"By grade 12," the report said, "both white and Negro students in the South score below their counterparts — white and Negro — in the North. In addition, Southern Negroes score farther below Southern whites than Northern Negroes score below Northern whites."

"The average white student's achievement," it noted, "is less affected by the strength and weakness of his school's facilities, curricula and teachers than is the average minority pupil's. To put it another way, the achievement of minority pupils depends more on the schools they attend than does the achievement of majority pupils."

Another important factor, the report said, is the extent to which a pupil believes he has some control over his destiny.

"The response of pupils to questions in the survey show that minority pupils, except for Orientals, have far less conviction than whites that they can affect their own environments and futures," it declared. "When they do, however, their achievement is higher than that of whites who lack that conviction."

Victimization of City's Poor Is Found Widespread

NYT 8/20/66

By RALPH BLUMENTHAL

A young mother on the Lower East Side bought a set of children's books from a door-to-dor saleswoman who said she represented the Board of Education.

A woman on Social Security was high-pressured into buying an off-brand vacuum cleaner that ended up costing $341.40.

An East Harlem housewife, shopping in a local used-furniture "special," was talked into signing a $1,414.80 installment contract for furniture that fell apart after delivery.

These cases of victimization of the poor are typical of thousands of others that point to a broad pattern of consumer fraud and overpricing in the city's ghettos.

Food prices, recently investigated by city and Federal agencies, are only a small part of the picture. Fraudulent selling practices in Harlem, the Lower East Side, the East Bronx and Brooklyn involve appliances, furs, food-freezer plans, burials, furniture, books and even wigs.

The extent of the problem was pointed up in a recent series of interviews with lawyers, anti-poverty workers and the victims themselves. The Legal Aid Society estimates that it defended 5,000 poor consumers against unfair or fraudulent selling practices last year. The consumer fraud lawyer for Mobilization for Youth, the Lower East Side antipoverty agency now has a file of 250 cases and estimates he has handled 2,000 over the last three years.

"Most of the ones [companies] we deal with," said Stephen Mindell, an assistant state Attorney General in the Consumer Frauds and Protection Bureau, "are making money sucking the blood of the poor."

"The poor," said Barnett Levy, who heads the bureau under Attorney General Louis J. Lefkowitz, "are less able to cope with the small print and legal terminology of contracts that even lawyers have trouble understanding."

The bureau received more than 30,000 personal and written complaints last year, most of them, Mr. Levy believes—although no breakdown is kept—from the poor.

Earlier this week the bureau obtained a State Supreme Court order restraining a book sales company at 11 West 42d Street from doing business under the name Operation Home Start.

The bureau's petition, filed after a policewoman infiltrated the company's staff, alleges that the concern sent salesmen into poor areas to sell at "unconscionable markups" children's books represented as allied with Operation Head Start, an official antipoverty program for preschoolers.

Myron Gelrod, president of the company, denied that his salesmen concentrated on ghetto areas or that there was any intent to deceive. The choice of the name, he said, "is truly indicative of the work we are doing." A court hearing has been set for next week.

Mrs. Florence Rice, consumer education consultant for the League of Autonomous Bronx Organizations for Renewal (LABOR), an East Bronx summer antipoverty project and one of the many groups now investigating consumer frauds, rates the food-freezer plans of some companies as the most notorious source of misleading or fraudulent deals.

"I just feel there's a tomorrow"

WHEN things go wrong in the East Bronx, Mrs. Florence May Rice is a likely person to be called on for help. Yesterday the heavy-set and jovial but deadly serious antipoverty aide got a call from a neighborhood tenant who wanted to know what to do about a snake in a friend's apartment. "Just ask her how long the snake is," Mrs. Rice said. "Is it three inches or what? I know what I'd do. Light sulphur candles and call the Fire Department. Of course, you should kill it. How can you go to sleep tonight with a snake in the apartment?"

Woman in the News

While Mrs. Rice handles many problems at the League of Autonomous Bronx Organizations for Renewal (LABOR) at 1052 Washington Avenue near 165th Street, she is working there this summer as a consumer education consultant. She is determined to curb some of the more notorious schemes to defraud the poor.

"There is nowhere for a poor consumer to go," she said quietly, without bitterness. "Really nowhere to go."

To give them a place, Mrs. Rice and another woman organized Harlem Consumers in 1963. Both women knew the need for such a group. Mrs. Rice's associate had worked in fur stores where she watched expensive furs pointing: only four persons showed up. Subsequent meetings drew more people, however, and Mrs. Rice became known as a formidable, though self-taught, champion of increased consumer protection.

She was subsequently retained as the consumer consultant of MEND, the Massive Economic Neighborhood Development, Inc., an East Harlem community action group. Mrs. Rice helped to prepare a survey that showed food and other prices were higher in Harlem than other parts of the city.

"Everybody is supposed to have a price," she said. "Well I have — getting things changed."

She was born Mar. 22, 1919 in Buffalo, abandoned by her mother and placed in an orphanage. She spent her childhood and early teen-age years living in foster homes from Peekskill to Long Island. At the age of 17, while she was living in New York, she had a daughter out of wedlock, a daughter who is now happily married with two children of her own.

Mrs. Rice's first job was as a domestic day worker. She would get the jobs by waiting at the "Slave Market," an area in the East Bronx where the jobless would wait on corners for work offers. She worked for a while in a laundry and, when the war broke out, in a New Jersey defense plant.

Bronx Woman Victimized

On the walls of the project's office at 1052 Washington Avenue at 165th Street are posters telling of the case of Mrs. Joyce Tutt of 1451 Washington Avenue.

Mrs. Tutt called a company that had advertised a plan on television. The salesman who called said she would save so much on food that the freezer would be free. She signed a contract for a freezer priced at $995 and two months of meat and frozen food at $189.82. With three years of credit and other charges the bill for the freezer without the food came to $1.454.70.

The two months of food ran out after five weeks. When she called for extra food, the company at first refused, then offered to send neck bones, pigs' feet, pigtails and frankfurters.

After Mrs. Tutt stopped her payments and turned the case over to the Legal Aid Society, the food-freezer company agreed to repossess the item. Scores of similar cases fill the files of Legal Aid and the Consumer Fraud Bureau.

A check with a large department store in the city showed that it sells a comparable 16 cubic foot freezer with a food plan for $459—a deal comparable to the one for which Mrs. Tutt was charged $995 in cash or $1,454.70 in installments.

Furniture sales cause another large number of complaints. Mrs. Juanita Brame of 350 East 124th Street was the woman who went into a Harlem furniture store to look at an advertised special — three bedrooms of used furniture for $179 — and came out committed to a $1,414.18 purchase.

When the furniture was delivered, several pieces were damaged. One table had no legs. She returned it and when it came back it had three brown legs and one black. The couch and chairs were not the same color she had ordered. Disappointed with the furniture, she stopped payments after several months and the furniture was repossessed. That was about three years ago. Last April she received a bill demanding payment for the full amount, $1,414.18.

In the Alice-inWonderland world of Harlem furniture stores, one warehouse demands a $10 to $30 "deposit" from customers before thay are allowed to see anything; one store charges $799 for a comparable set of traditional furniture priced at $399 in another store.

Fur-remodeling establishments have been cited in a number of complaints. A consumer aide who formerly worked in a fur store put The Times in touch with two poor people who turned in furs for remodeling and received pieces they later learned were inferior substitutions. A third customer was never given back her fur.

Housewives living in low income apartment projects complained that they were besieged by door-to-door salesmen selling dishes, books (one salesman sold books on the Negro heritage that that turned out upon delivery to be just newsclippings about the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King), vacuum cleaners and expensive wigs.

"We would only hit the poor people," said a young man who used to sell vacuum cleaners on commission. "Only the projects."

Once the customer signs a credit sale contract, the seller turns around and sells the contract to a credit company or a bank, which informs the customer that he has ten days to report any complaints.

After that period — which is often too short to discover malfunctioning in a product — the credit company is free from responsibility for the product. It just wants its payments. The original seller, meanwhile, says he no longer holds the contract and can do nothing about complaints. If an aggrieved purchaser then defaults on payments, his wages can be garnisheed.

Mrs. Rice's associate had worked in fur stores where she watched expensive furs brought in for remodeling replaced by worthless pieces that were returned to the customer. Mrs. Rice had worked in a Harlem furniture store.

"There were many ways of taking the people's money," she recalled. "They would be asked to put down a deposit before seeing the merchandise. The idea was to get their deposit. They'd sit there waiting and waiting to get it back."

Won Drive for Coffee Breaks

Mrs. Rice is frank to admit that the store dismissed her. She left her selling post, she said, to argue with a store officer when he told a worker not to take a coffee break. The coffee breaks were a concession Mrs. Rice helped win after a strenuous union organizing campaign at the store.

The first meeting of Harlem Consumers was disappointing, she also recalls, the massive Economic Neighborhood Development, Inc., an East Harlem community action group. Mrs. Rice helped to prepare a survey that showed food and other prices were higher in Harlem than other parts of the city.

"Everybody is supposed to have a price," she said. "Well I have — getting things changed."

Recalls Past Troubles

After the war, she worked in the garment center as a piece worker until she ran afoul of the leadership of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union, whom she accused of anti-Negro bias. She then began work in the furniture store.

She is not bitter and smiles often recalling her years of troubles. "It's not that I'm any stronger or better than other people," she says. "I just feel there's a tomorrow."

What she likes to tell people is, "If somebody knocks you down, the only thing to do is get up again."

Mrs. Rice lives alone at 540 West 158th Street in Manhattan. When she's not working on a special consumer project she likes to take some of the East Bronx children aside and explain to them the importance of keeping a savings account or the intricacies of credit buying.

U.S. Aide Urges Exposure of Schoolbook Bias

Education Chief Tells House Unit He Opposes Censorship of Racial Distortions

WASHINGTON, Aug. 23 (UPI)—The United States Commissioner of Education said today that the best solution to the problem of racially distorted schoolbooks was to expose them to public view.

"We should no longer let this problem be swept under the rug," Harold Howe 2d told a House Education subcommittee. He said public hearings were helpful.

But Mr. Howe told the subcommittee his agency could do little to force schools to use balanced library and textbooks because it was strictly forbidden to interfere with state and local educational policies.

"Our efforts should be to encourage voluntary action by the states and localities by getting information into their hands," he said. Mr. Howe emhasized he had no wish to be a censor.

North and South Problem

"Such a power is wholly inconsistent with the concept of democracy as we know it," he said. "The Office of Education does not possess such power, nor do we seek it."

The problem of evading "meaningful" reading material on Negroes and other minority groups exists in the North as well as the South, Mr. Howe said. He described the general tone of many schoolbooks this way:

"The world of 'Look, Jane, Look' usually is a white suburban world. Daddy goes off to work each morning and returns each evening; mother stays home with her children and her pretty house and well-kept green yard.

"What relevance does this scene have to the child of the city whose mother works outside the home, whose yard is in the street? The world presented is competely alien, its elements bear no relationship to everyday existence in the city."

Powell Calls Hearing

Mr. Howe was the first witness at a planned five-day hearing called by Adam Clayton Powell, Democrat of Manhattan. Mr. Powell has said something should be done about "racially distorted and offensive textbooks and biased library books which depict minority groups solely in an inferior and subjugated position—or even worse, ignores them altogether."

Mr. Howe deplored the fact that many history books in the schools ignore African and Asian history and until recently made no mention of American Negroes since the Civil War.

He said one Virginia high school history text discussed the "advantages" of slavery to the Negroes in America.

NEGRO EDITOR SCORES 'SEGREGATED' TEXTS

Boston Post

WASHINGTON, Aug. 31 (AP)—A Negro editor chargd today that most history textbooks ignored the contributions of his race to American society.

Lerone Bennett of Chicago, editor of Ebony Magazine, told a House Education subcommittee the current turmoil in many of the big cities reflected a school failure to prepare youths to live in a multiracial society. He called for a Federal conference to study textbooks.

"It is my opinion, and the opinion of many writers and scholars in this field," he said, "that segregated textbooks—the segregated and segregating use of words, symbols and ideas—are as dangerous to the internal peace of America as segregated schools and residential areas."

"Contrary to the popular view," Mr. Bennett said, "Black people came to America long before the Mayflower. They were with the first French and Spanish explorers. The fought with Prescott on Bunker Hill, they were with Washington at Valley Forge, they were with Grant in Virginia.

"With rare exceptions, American textbooks ignore free Negroes and present a rose-colored view of American slavery."

The Federal Role Grows

By FRED M. HECHINGER

In the days of the Little Red Schoolhouse, public education may have been an inexpensive, nonpolitical enterprise. Last week the American Political Science Association, at its annual meeting in New York, heard impressive evidence that public education today, being a matter of Big Money, cannot stay out of the mainstream of high-level politics.

Alan K. Campbell, professor of political science and director of the Metropolitan Studies Program at Syracuse University, painted a grim picture of the growing gap between the schools of the big cities and those of the surrounding suburbs. He blamed in large measure the fact that, in the financially hard-pressed urban centers, the school boards lack political influence beyond the boundaries of their districts. Therefore they are unsuccessful in pressing for adequate state and Federal aid. He saw such aid as the only hope for the urban schools' rebirth.

His colleague from Syracuse, Stephen K. Bailey, dean of the Maxwell Graduate School of Public Affairs, however, documented the growing role of the Federal government—with Congress now pressing for far greater expenditures than asked for by "a parsimonious President."

Large Piece Of Pork

Mr. Bailey, a former professor, ex-Mayor of Middletown, Conn., and alumnus of several Presidential task forces, said: "The fact is that education has now become a large element in the Congressional pork barrel."

These two analyses are not in conflict. They supplement each other.

Professor Campbell, in depicting the plight of the cities, showed that in 1957 the expenditures per pupil were about the same for city and suburb, while the cities today are about $150 behind. Moreover, the proportion of nonwhites since 1900 has increased from 6.8 per cent to 17.8 per cent of the population in the central cities, while it has declined from 9.4 to 5.2 per cent in the areas outside the cities. Within the cities, in 1964, the median family income for Negroes was $4,463, compared with $7,212 for whites.

But exactly because the suburbs are prosperous and the central cities are plagued by huge fiscal problems in all departments, not alone in education, state and Federal school aid given to the cities has increasingly resulted in reductions in the local budget, while such aid has been almost entirely in addition to previous local effort in the suburbs. Thus, even with outside aid, the gap widens.

Professor Campbell's studies indicate that slight improvements in the slum-blighted cities—reduction of class size by a few pupils—will simply not make any difference. Only a massive effort can do the job, and there is little hope that such an effort can be underwritten by anything other than city-oriented outside aid.

Mr. Bailey would not disagree with this estimate, but he nevertheless does not share his colleague's pessimism. The Bailey study was made, not on the local school level, with its lack of political sophistication, but in Washington. There, a totally different picture emerges.

The revolution in the Federal role appears in Mr. Bailey's painstaking study of the transformation of the United States Office of Education. From a sleepy statistical office in the days before President Kennedy, it was transformed by Francis Keppel (1962-65) and his successor, Harold Howe 2d, into a key instrumental in shepherding major Federal aid legislation through Congress and administering such funds.

It was a transformation that could not take place without drastic and even brutal changes within the bureaucracy. That education had become a top political priority was reflected in the fact that the battles involved the White House itself. When Mr. Keppel insisted on getting Henry Loomis, then Director of the Voice of America, as his deputy in charge of remolding the U.S. Office of Education, the repercussions were felt on the highest level.

"Loomis's transfer from V.O.A. to U.S.O.E. was marked and marred by Presidential pique," Mr Bailey wrote. ". . . Loomis had been uncooperative in buying and selling tickets for Democratic party dinners. . . . It came down to the question whether the White House was going to permit the Commissioner of Education to have a deputy of his own choice." The only picture that decorated Mr. Loomis's office, it might be added, was a portrait of General Eisenhower.

New Form Of Help

Out of this test of strength, followed by a year of internal turmoil, emerged a new leadership structure for education in Washington.

It is at this point that the Campbell plea for a rescue mission to save the city schools and the Bailey account of the new leadership in Washington become key pieces in the same jigsaw puzzle.

For if the local school boards in the cities (especially in competition with the wealthier suburbs) lack political know-how and the anti-urban state legislatures lack sympathy, there is now a promise of help from a new educational force at the center of national politics.

This may, as Mr. Bailey hints, invite the dangers of the pork barrel.

But it also promises a source of aid with a less provincial point of view.

Professor Campbell fears that the cities will not get enough. Mr. Bailey fears that the pork barrel will get too much. But a new fact may well be that the streamlined Office of Education, for the first time close to the center of governmental power, may make up for the lagging political sophistication in the urban school leadership—at least until a new educational power group can be trained in and for the cities.

Meanwhile, Mr. Bailey hinted that, though strengthened, the Office of Education is still in need of higher status and greater efficiency to prevent educational spending from being scattered aimlessly and ineffectively. He raised again the old question of the need for a separate Cabinet department of education.

Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare John W. Gardner has argued with persuasive finality that the three major areas of his department are and should be inextricably intertwined. It is far more likely that the solution will be sought in another arrangement now much discussed behind the scenes in Washington—re-organization along Pentagon lines. H.E.W. would still be headed by one over-all secretary, but three new Secretaries (Health, Education, Welfare) would function under him much as the Secretaries of Army, Navy and Air Force operate under the Secretary of Defense.

Such grand strategies confirm that education is at the center of the national political controls, even as urban school boards still struggle to develop enough political muscle to do education's most crucial job. The unresolved question remains whether the Office of Education can be made powerful and efficient enough to promise to the nation's urban schools the kind of alliance which the provincialism of the state capitols and the impotence of the city halls have denied them.

A VOICE FOR EDUCATION: Hard-pressed urban schools are increasingly looking to Washington for new funds. Here Harlod Howe 2d, United States Commissioner of Education, is shown at recent House subcommittee hearings which tried to determine whether the reorganized Office of Education is up to its new Federal aid mission. Charts show how Federal funds, distributed by the office, have skyrocketed as a result of recent legislation.

Integration Gaining

By LEONARD BUDER

Until about five years ago school segregation was regarded as largely a Southern problem. Integration was a major issue in perhaps no more than half a dozen Northern school systems.

Then the realization set in, sparked largely by pressures from civil rights groups, that school segregation was a problem whether it was the result of discriminatory laws (as in the South) or discriminatory practices or subtle prejudices (as in the North).

Last week, as most of the nation's schools reopened for the new academic year—the late starters will open tomorrow—there were hopeful signs of new progress toward school integration.

In Washington, the United States Commissioner of Education, Harold Howe 2d, predicted that there would be as much progress this school year as in the previous 12 years since the historic United States Supreme Court decision on school segregation.

Most of the progress, Mr. Howe said, will take place in the South.

In New York City, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People issued a report on its four-and-a-half-year campaign to promote school integration in the North, which now involves 130 public school systems in 22 states. In about two-thirds of these systems, some progress toward integration has been made—although it has often been not no more than tokenism.

The gains have been greater in the suburban systems and smaller cities, Miss June Shagaloff, the association's national education director, noted. And frequently, she added, they have come about not through enlightened school leadership but as the result of "extended community pressure, protest demonstrations and litigation."

Northern and Western school systems where total or substantial desegregation will take place for the first time this fall, the report said, include Albany, Amityville and Roosevelt, N. Y.; Lansing, Mich.; and Sacramento, Carlsbad, Fullerton, Riverside, Indio and Fresno, Calif. New plans expanding existing desegregation efforts will take place in Freeport and Malverne, N. Y.; Stamford, Conn.; Englewood and Montclair, N. J.; Denver; and Sausalito and Berkeley, Calif.

Plans Held 'Inadequate'

The desegregation efforts employed in these communities, Miss Shagaloff observed, range from school pairing and rezoning to closing old, all-Negro schools and establishing new primary and intermediate schools.

New but limited (and "inadequate," according to the N.A.A.C.P.) desegregation plans will go into effect in a number of other communities, including Bridgeport, Conn.; Cincinnati, Des Moines, Iowa; Detroit and Indianapolis.

All told, some 38 school districts in the North and West have taken steps to desegregate, including New York City, which has embarked on a reorganization that will result in a new system of primary, intermediate and comprehensive high schools. Another 42 communities will continue desegregation efforts started since 1962. And a few others have announced plans to take effect next year.

In other communities, however, school officials have been evasive, Miss Shagaloff said.

"But the problem," Miss Shagaloff added, "is not that of administrative know-how—it is the unwillingness to change the status quo."

A Survey Of Surveys

The American Psychological Association, at its annual meeting in New York last week, took yet another stab at the perennial question of what ails America. It diagnosed a severe case of "survey sickness."

A panel of experts charged that researchers working for foundations or Government agencies, graduate students and a variety of expense-account tourists with para-academic interests and credentials are a disruptive nuisance. However, one of the complainants, Prof. Kalman H. Silvert, of Dartmouth College, admitted that he is currently mailing 5,600 questionnaires to schools in Chile which, if conscientiously completed, would require 10,000 hours of effort.

The survey sickness has many causes. One of the most fundamental is that American schools, as foreign observers frequently note, inoculate students with the notion that compilations of facts is synonymous with unlocking knowledge and understanding.

Indeed, educators themselves frequently create the impression that the battle for school improvement and social reform could be won, if only all the data were collected. Moreover, survey findings are just as useful to document the need to preserve the status quo as to propagate change. Pressures for change can be cushioned and deflected by protestations that nothing should be done until all the facts are in—and, of course, all the facts are never in.

Questions By Rote

Thus, surveys are often conducted on questions to which the answers are really not in doubt (such as the impact of undesirable environment on young children) when effective social and educational reform could be introduced on the basis of general knowledge and common sense. Many effective changes, of course, are made by hunch rather than by survey.

Finally, surveys proliferate simply because a huge number of doctoral candidates must, under current ground rules, produce "original scholarship." Since such fields as education and sociology are, for better or for worse, deeply committed to the imitation of the scientific method, such scholarship depends largely on surveys and often on the frantic search for new questions about old issues.

It is in revolt against such redundant efforts, merely to fulfill the Ph.D. requirements, that increasing numbers of critics, even in academia, are urging the substitution of critical analysis and creative commentary on social and educational problems for the too often hothouse grown research that is neither original nor productive and keeps the questionnaires coming.

The Integration Fight Pays Dividends

By FRED M. HECHINGER

In recent years, it has become fashionable and expedient to insist that there is no difference between school segregation North and South. For Southern segregationists, this is a way of telling the North to mind its own backyard. For Northern liberals, it is a well-intentioned device to push for speedier integration. Last week's opening of a new school year—in New York and in Grenada, Mississippi—offered classic documentation of the fact that "North equals South" is a phony equation.

The violence, including the beating of young Negro pupils, that followed attempts to desegregate two all-white public schools in Grenada, underlined once again that Southern desegregation remains largely a local and political problem, not an educational issue. It is a question of marshaling sufficient protective force to break a local custom of apartheid which has, since the historic Supreme Court decision of 1954, become a violation of the law of the land.

Taking the events in New York as a sample of the Northern situation, it quickly becomes evident that the issue there is now predominantly educational. Integration is still a vital part of the issue, but desegregation is not. Negro children are not kept out of white schools, nor white children out of Negro schools, if their parents wish to send them there.

Controversy

The controversy of the week in New York was raised when a group of Negro parents prevented the Board of Education from opening the new Intermediate School 201, the only fully air-conditioned school in the city, because its location in East Harlem threatened to make it a predominantly Negro and Puerto Rican school, unless white parents volunteer to send their children there.

The parents, aided by various Negro groups, a local white minister and some academic integration experts, gave the board two alternatives:

¶Bring in white pupils and integrate the school.

¶Or give the Negro parents "total control" over the administration of the school, including the selection of principal and teachers.

Neither demand was ever likely to be met. The board had distributed some invitations to white parents outside the Harlem ghetto to send their children to what it promised to turn into an academic showcase. But it was not likely that enough, if any, parents would volunteer to bring about such reverse integration. (The I.S. 201 parents stressed, however, that their objections had been ignored when the site for the new school was picked).

As for "total control," no school board is legally permitted or educationally able to give any group or neighborhood such powers.

Moreover, any such move would be cheered by racists in predominantly white areas who could then claim equal "total control." This would, in short order, lead to total fragmentation of public education and abandonment of the public schools' mission to give cohesion to society. (It is legal segregation in the South that has blocked this cohesion.)

Late last week, however, Dr. Bernard E. Donovan, the Superintendent of Schools, offered the residents of the district of I.S. 201 a considerable voice in the running of the schools, including participation in the screening of the teaching staff.

But quite apart from the specific demands and controversies in New York, the following crucial differences from the Southern situation emerge:

While Negroes in the South are fighting for their children's right to be taught along with white children and by some white teachers, the battle cry in the Northern cities is increasingly to get greater numbers of Negro teachers and principals for Negro children. "Black teachers for black children" has become a battle slogan in Harlem. While this reflects in part the voice of a small but vocal Black Nationalist element, it more generally represents the legitimate demand to open up equal professional opportunities for Negroes and to bolster the Negro pupils' pride in their place in society.

Underlining further the difference between the Northern and Southern problem is the fact that enforced desegregation in the South has led to the firing of considerable numbers of Negro teachers there—to avoid admitting them to jobs in desegregated white schools—while New York is feverishly trying to recruit Negro teachers. It is a measure of the depth of the Southern school problem that few Negro teachers there have had the chance for the kind of professional training that qualifies them for appointment to Northern schools.

One reason why the phony North-equals-South equation tended to be accepted so widely for so long was the fact that civil rights leaders at first focused primarily on demands for integration of all Northern schools through a variety of devices—pairing of Negro and white schools, busing to other neighborhoods, redrawing of district lines, etc. These devices not only aroused opposition among the white majority who feared that their own children's education might be hurt, but they also proved inadequate to bring about anything resembling effective integration in those urban centers where huge areas are inhabited almost exclusively by Negroes.

Negro Concern

Today—as I.S. 201 indicates—the Negro concern in the North is increasingly with better education, with pertinent teaching (including full presentation of Negro history), with an equal role for Negroes in the teaching and administration and with the right of the community to have its demands heard. ("Total control" demands may well be the momentary, misguided reaction to a past situation in which the Negroes, like other poor and disadvantaged at other times, exercised no control at all because they lacked political power.)

As a result, the Northern Negroes' fight for a better educational deal for their children is no longer a black-versus-white argument—as it so brutally is in diehard sections of the South.

The Northern school integration crusade has begun to pay off—in better educational opportunities for all children. A superficial but telling illustration is the fact that all hands, from school clerks to principals, in New York's vast, 860-school system seemed more considerate and courteous as school opened last Monday.

Minority spokesmen in the past often complained that they were given a run-around or were even insulted by brusque school secretaries. They often saw in this a racial insult. In fact, the keepers of the schools' gates frequently behaved like disgruntled bus drivers or police state bureaucrats toward all comers, without regard for race, color or creed.

Now, alerted and reoriented as a consequence of civil rights spokesmen's complaints, a new attitude of public service is beginning to turn the schools into happier places for all.

Even more significant is the designation of I.S. 201 itself. One of the first of a new group of Intermediate or Middle Schools, it reflects the trend toward the replacement of junior high schools.

For years, junior high schools had been severely criticized. Created largely for the purpose of sheltering the younger adolescents from the influence of the high school crowd, the junior high school instead became the isolation ward in which the worst immaturities of adolescence flourished. These schools, from grade 7 through 9, turned into kings of the roost the youngsters who normally would have been meek high school freshmen.

In these schools, as Dr. James B. Conant complained, all the worst trappings of the high schools—marching bands, varsity sports and even steady dating—were hothouse-grown.

Despite all the dissatisfaction, the junior high school lobby remained strong and immovable.

Only under civil rights pressure did reorganization plans begin to get a fair hearing. The proposal of the 4-4-4 plan—four years each of elementary, middle, and high school—was strongly advanced for purposes of better integration. Youngsters would remain in the "neighborhood school," which most strongly reflects de facto housing segregation, only for four years. Since the middle school serves (not unlike the junior high school) a wider area, it is more likely to feed youngsters out of the neighborhood into a more effectively mixed enrollment two years sooner.

Valid as the integration reasoning is, it is more than matched by potential education gains for everybody.

The Southern school story last week remained political rather than educational. It was still a question of equal political rights under the law. The Northern school story, as dramatized in New York was one of the quest for better education, whether inside or outside the ghetto. Some critics charge that for those who live in de facto segregated parts of the Northern cities this amounts to a re-enactment of the "separate but equal" doctrine. They overlook the importance of current efforts to make the ghetto schools educationally superior, not to persuade Negroes to submit permanently to apartheid, but rather to use education as the ladder out of poverty, substandard living and, with it, segregation.

This is in the tradition of the American public schools as the gateway for the last-arrived minorities. The Southern course of using the schools as the instrument of exclusion—as in the conflict in Grenadalast week—remains educationally and politically un-American in the most basic sense of that term.

The New York Times (by Neal Boenzi)

NO PUPILS: Teacher in empty classroom at New York's new, fully air-conditioned Intermediate School 201 in East Harlem. Negro parents have kept their children out of school pending Settlement of dispute over integration and other school policies.

YUMMY ROLE IN PITTSBURGH

A decade ago, Norwegian school experts discovered that most pupils did their least effective work at the start of the school day, when they should be rested and raring to go. They traced the slow start to the fact that most youngsters eat unsatisfactory breakfasts—the poor because they are not served a decent meal and the affluent because they get up too late to have time for more than a bite on the run. The official answer was a school breakfast for everyone, which came to be known as the Oslo Breakfast. The early morning learning curve immediately rose.

Last week, after extensive research, the Pittsburgh schools disclosed that they, too, found pupils in need of a nutritional head start. Looking for a cheap and efficient way for quick mass-feeding, the system unveiled a new high-protein roll available in three flavors (meat, cheese and peanut butter) which is packed with protein, vitamins and the necessary calories and was unhappily christened the Pittsburgh Yummy Roll.

'Mustn't Teach, Teacher!'

An old Jewish story, ridiculing the follies of official bureaucracies, tells of a little boy who breathlessly tries to gain admission to the synagogue during services on the High Holy Days. The guard at the door demands to see the admission ticket, but the youngster, close to tears, pleads that he just wants to get to his father in the temple to tell him to come home in a hurry because his mother, who was ill, has taken a turn for the worse.

At first, the guard adamantly insists on seeing the admissions pass, but eventually he succumbs to the child's pleading. "All right," he says, "go and get your Dad, but," shaking his finger at the boy, "don't let me catch you praying!"

Last week Congress appeared determined to re-enact the story in its dealings with the National Teacher Corps.

Under a resolution passed by the House of Representatives, more than 1,200 young men and women who spent the summer training to become members of the Corps, to be assigned to classrooms across the country, were told that they were welcome to go into the schools as observers—so long as no Congressional investigator caught them teaching.

The Corps, proposed by President Johnson more than a year ago, has become a victim of delays and legislative harassment.

Although part of the Higher Education Act of 1965, it has never had the wholehearted support of many of the education supporters in Congress, perhaps partly because the powerful professional education establishment on the state level, especially in the South, fears that Corps volunteers might, as outsiders, undermine the existing power structure.

Fashioned to some extent along Peace Corps lines, the N.T.C. worried some observers. The conservative view appears to be that the kind of fresh ideas that might be good for an Asian village could be disturbing in Appalachia.

In addition — more understandably—there was concern lest the local teachers might resent the greater glamor of the Corpsmen and be envious of certain advantages in terms of graduate fellowships offered corps members.

Whatever the reasons, the potential impact of the Corps has been steadily reduced, even in the planning stage. The original budget proposal was cut. The number of trainees was reduced from 4,000 to 1,616 last summer on a training budget of about $9-million.

Nevertheless, these young college graduates, who were to be sent to schools in teams under the supervision of highly experienced teachers, spent the summer in special training on 42 university campuses. As the summer ended, Congress had not yet acted on the funding to make the Corps operational, even though the request had been reduced from $30-million to less than $20-million. A Senate appropriations subcommittee last week recommended that the Corps be given $7-5-million. Even that inadequate amount still requires Senate and House approval.

New Contracts Curtailed

A trickle of trainees has left to take other jobs, but Corps officials stress that even today 1,252 are still sticking with the uncertain mission. Others are said to be ready to return to active duty when the financial go ahead is given.

But—apparently to show its legislative muscle—a House resolution of June 30, reaffirmed on Aug. 30, warned that until the program is funded "no new contractual arrangements shall be entered into in connection with the National Teacher Corps nor shall any contract of any kind be made with respect to the assignment of any teacher to teach in any school under that program."

To give teeth to this prohibition, Representative Melvin Laird, Republican of Wisconsin, ordered an investigation. Eight special investigators are currently trying to make sure that the Corpsmen, who have since been assigned to schools as "observers" and for additional training by the universities that trained them, are not violating the Congressional edict.

Thus, as schools opened, faced with the most serious teacher shortage in a decade, the House, not unlike the synagogue guard, appeared to say: "All right, go into the schools, if you must, but don't let us catch you teaching."

TEACHER OPPOSES THE TERM 'NEGRO'

Urges Federation to Drive for Use of 'Afro-American'

By NAN ROBERTSON

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Dec. 9—A conference of teachers was urged today to mount a drive to drop the "slave name" Negro and use the term Afro-American to describe the black population of the United States.

Keith Baird, a Barbados-born teacher of languages at Bushwick High School in Brooklyn, introduced a resolution to this effect at a national meeting of the powerful American federation of teachers. The topics were Negro history and "racism in education."

Mr. Baird said it was high time that Negroes moved up to hyphenated status such as the Italian-Americans and other minority groups, thus indicating an "ethnic identity" and a connection with "land, culture and history."

The term Negro, he said, was used "solely to describe the enslaved and the enslavable," dating from the time that Africans were brought forcibly to this country.

Charles Cogen, the federation's President and a prime oranizer of New York City's teachers in the early nineteen-sixties, supported Mr. Baird's plea for the term Afro-American. So also did Ossie Davis, actor and civil rights activist, who gave the keynote speech.

James McPherson, a historian at Princeton University, sounded another major theme of the conference, which was that until recently, American textbooks gave a distorted picture of the contributions and roles of Negroes in the life of this country.

He told the more than 1,000 teachers attending the conference that until the middle of the nineteen-fifties, American school children, both black and white, had been shaped by school books that universally portrayed Negroes as happy, carefree children under slavery, and Northern abolitionists as fanatics.

Dr. McPherson cited "American Negro Slavery" by Ulrich B. Phillips, published in 1918, as the most influential work for decades propounding this point of view. Mr. Phillips, a Southerner, and his students, assumed the "innate inferiority" of the Negro and the benevolent paternalism of the planters, according to the Princeton professor.

He also named the classic textbook, "Growth of the American Republic," by Samuel Eliot Morrison and Henry Steele Commager. Dr. McPherson said that through the thirties and forties, editions of this book referred to Negro slaves as Sambo, and maintained that they were adequately fed, well cared for, better off than Northern laborers, and devoted to their masters.

Mr. Davis, whose speech was subtitled "The English Langua Is My Enemy," noted that English was one of the "prime carriers of racism."

He said that in Roget's Thesaurus" there were 134 synonyms for the word "whiteness", mostly favorable such as purity, clean, chaste, innocent; and 120 synonyms for "blackness," at least 60 offensive such as blot, smut, begrime, sinister and foul.

The actor suggested that the English language be "reconstructed" to cure the problem so that teachers would not be forced "to teach the Negro child 60 ways to despise himself and the white child 60 ways to aid and abet him in the crime."

Component Centers Appoint Advisory Councils

Now that all Component Centers of Southeastern Education Laboratory are staffed with a Director and other key personnel, rapid progress is being made in the establishment of Component Advisory Councils. In accordance with the By-Laws of the Laboratory, each Advisory Council includes:

1. School personnel—selected by Boards of Directors of state organizations as follows: elementary teachers (2), secondary teachers (2), elementary principals (2), secondary principals (2), supervisory personnel (2), superintendents (2).
2. State department of education personnel—selected by chief state school officers (2).
3. Teacher education institution personnel—selected by institution presidents as follows: with Doctoral programs (2), with Master's programs (1), with Bachelor's programs only—a minimum of one or one-third of the eligible institutions.
4. Other representatives—selected by the representatives appointed in categories one, two, and three above—a minimum of ten members, broadly representative of other educational agencies (including private and parochial schools) and related organizations, governmental and community groups, business and industry, labor, and lay citizens.

Members of Component Advisory Councils serve rotating two-year terms. Each Council elects a Chairman, Vice-Chairman and Secretary. The Councils meet at least semi-annually. Executive Committees, typically composed of officers and two other Council members, meet more frequently with the staff in each Component Center. Purpose of the Advisory Councils is to give grass roots advice on activities of the Laboratory.

Current Chairmen of Advisory Councils are as follows:

Athens—Dean J. A. Williams, University of Georgia
Athens, Georgia

Atlanta—Mr. Lynn F. Shufelt, Emory University
Atlanta, Georgia

Auburn—Dean Truman Pierce, Auburn University
Auburn, Alabama

Tuscaloosa—Dean Robert E. Bills, University of Alabama

A complete roster of the Advisory Council in your component area can be obtained from the Component Center Director.

Regional Council Reviews Laboratory Activities at Semi-Annual Meeting

December 8 and 9 members of the Laboratory's 62 man Regional Council met in Atlanta with the Board of Directors, Central Staff, Component Center Directors, Chairmen of Component Advisory Councils, and other educational leaders from Florida, Georgia and Alabama to review the status of SEL activities. The theme of the meeting was, "The Challenge of Alleviating Educational Deprivation." Following a resumé of current SEL operations, the group devoted its attention to identifying new opportunities for alleviating educational deprivation through the Laboratory.

ERIC - 2½ Tons of Research At Your Fingertips

ERIC is an educational information service created in 1964 by the U. S. Office of Education "to facilitate and coordinate information storage and retrieval efforts in all areas of research."

ERIC gets its name from the Educational Research Information Center, a unit in the Division of Research Training and Dissemination, Bureau of Research, Office of Education.

ERIC disseminates information in much the same way that other government agencies and private industries do — with one basic difference: ERIC is decentralized. Research specialists are left where they are. Twelve field operations have so far been selected which serve as informational input clearing houses or research documentation centers in the ERIC system. They are located across the nation where well-developed collections of educational materials already exist.

Each center specializes in one area of research and has the responsibility for being aware of research projects in its specialty that are underway everywhere in the country. Center specialists clear documents for inclusion in the ERIC-central system. If a paper is judged desirable, it is carefully summarized in 250 words and sent to Washington for scrutiny.

When a document is approved by the Office of Education, it goes into the ERIC system, becomes available in abstract form to the entire educational world through the ERIC MICROFISCHE FILE. Microfische cards are indexed for easy use and are distributed to all 50 state departments of education, 100 large city school systems and 500 randomly selected medium-size city school systems.

Presently the ERIC system provides abstracts of 1,740 documents on Microfische that are particularly useful as support material for planning programs for the educationally disadvantaged. For intensive study of promising material, copies of original documents may be obtained at nominal cost, either on microfilm or hardcopy, through the ERIC Document Reproduction Service. Additional educational research documents will be available as new abstracts are received from ERIC information centers, reviewed and included in the Microfische file. Orders for materials are generally filled within five days after requests are received. Thus, by providing a systematic and comprehensive communication link between researchers in the field and the many potential users of new knowledge—particularly teachers and administrators — ERIC can effectively contribute to speedy and widespread implementation of new programs which promise to alleviate educational deprivation.

SEL staff are currently reviewing the ERIC Microfische library in the Central office to discover which new educational materials described in it are applicable to the Laboratory's nine program dimensions:

1. Development of our region's human resources.
2. Improvement of classroom teaching and learning.
3. Resolution of problems created by desegregating dual school systems.
4. Development of new leadership to accelerate educational improvement.
5. Preparing more effective teachers for the underprivileged.
6. Introducing and testing new curricula and instructional materials.
7. Aiding development and use of new school facilities.
8. Projects designed to illuminate the processes of dissemination and innovation.
9. Projects designed to develop appropriate new cross-cultural programs, particularly as they involve children, youth and adults of different cultural, national and/or racial backgrounds.

Information about these materials will soon be available through the Laboratory Component Center nearest you.

Can ERIC help solve some of the problems of the educationally deprived in your area? SEL staff members think it can and are eager to assist you in the use of this new information storage and retrieval system.

A Slide Presentation explaining the ERIC program and how it can be useful to you is now ready for distribution to SEL Component Offices. Ask the SEL Component Director in your area to arrange a showing for you. He will be prepared to direct you to the ERIC Microfische File in your vicinity, and SEL invites you to explore ERIC's information as we work to alleviate educational deprivation across the region.

this is SEL...

SOUTHEASTERN EDUCATION LABORATORY was founded in June, 1966, to help all educators in Georgia, Alabama and Florida produce more and more responsible citizens for our free society through the formal education process. The goal of SEL is to provide regional leadership for educational program improvements which are particularly beneficial to educationally deprived people in the Southeast. The Laboratory is financed in part with funds from Title IV of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 and in part with funds from other public and private sources. The immediate aim of SEL is to help all educators in schools, colleges and educational agencies of the region provide appropriate and exciting new educational experiences that will motivate continuing good growth and development of deprived children in our schools. As one of twenty new federally sponsored regional education laboratories blanketing the nation, SEL also will seek to develop some of its programs to serve broader regional and national purposes.

LABORATORY COMPONENTS

Educators are assisted in SEL activities through eight service centers conveniently located around the tri-state region. Service centers are located in Tuscaloosa and Auburn, Alabama; Athens and Atlanta, Georgia; Tallahassee, Gainesville, Tampa and Miami, Florida. The component service centers are the action arms of your regional education laboratory. The SEL central office in Atlanta facilitates and coordinates the work of these centers.

SOUTHEASTERN EDUCATION LABORATORY

PROGRAM FOCUS

SEL is responsible for performing several major educational service functions. These are: (1) to assist in the development of region-wide programs that hold promise for the rapid elimination of educational deprivation among the region's culturally and educationally disadvantaged; (2) to provide planning assistance and program development services to appropriate operating agencies and institutions in the region, particularly in the development of new programs for the educationally disadvantaged; (3) to disseminate ideas and information that are relevant to a region-wide attack on educational deprivation; and, (4) to stimulate and support research, particularly that which is relevant to the acceleration of educational improvement for the educationally deprived.

SEL supports on-going programs and activities for the socially, culturally and educationally disadvantaged with a systematic focus on the elimination of educational and cultural deprivation. In particular, the Laboratory seeks to provide region-wide leadership to assist in the functional coordination and focusing of such diverse programs as those presently in operation or being planned under Titles I and III of P. L. 89–10; NDEA, Title XI; Title IV of the Civil Rights Act; EOA; the National Teacher Corps, etc. SEL fosters the development of a comprehensive regional program of research, local school system experimentation, planning assistance, and personnel training, which will assist responsible agencies and institutions in the process of solving problems resulting from dual school systems and their integration. SEL assists in developing appropriate new curricula as well as new curricular and instructional materials, and in establishing new programs to prepare educational personnel who are skilled in the use of these tools for learning. Laboratory activities are reinforced by a number of important supporting services and activities including, ultimately, a region-wide educational data processing and evaluation system.

The professional staff in the central office and component centers of SEL seeks to provide professional leadership assistance services to educators in three ways: (1) by focusing attention and activity principally upon educational problems of regional and national concern; (2) by maximizing use of the region's resources and institutions; and, (3) by coordinating the activities of independent agencies within the context of a cooperatively developed regional program and plan.

SEL may best be viewed as a new system of relationships among the state education agencies, universities, school systems, and other education related agencies, both public and private. As such, the Laboratory provides a powerful new mechanism through which the region may pursue excellence in educational endeavors, ultimately assuring each of its citizens an excellent and equal educational opportunity.

ACTIVITIES UNDERWAY

Southeastern Education Laboratory has received, reviewed and evaluated to date 73 separate proposals for action projects from 21 of the region's universities, state education departments, large urban school systems and other related educational organizations and agencies. Each proposal for action has been examined in detail by professionals in the component service centers. A panel of 10 distinguished educators has been assembled to review these proposals as well, and to select from the 73 possible projects those meriting immediate support. The panel chose 27 proposals for intensive review. Eight of these were selected for immediate funding.

They are:

A. Projects Designed to Improve Classroom Teaching and Learning

1. The Effects of Teacher In-Service Education on The Development of Art Ideas with Six-Year Old Culturally Deprived Children
2. A Demonstration of the Role of Sciences in the Programs of Educationally Deprived Children in Grades 7–9
3. Problem Solving Processes of School Children and Their Amenability to Improvement

B. Projects Designed to Improve School Personnel

4. A Pilot Project in the Use of Video Tape Techniques and Micro Teaching Strategies in the Supervision of Interns and Classroom Teachers
5. Special Training Program, and Follow-up In-Service Program for Junior High School Teachers of Culturally Deprived Children

C. Project Designed to Improve Educational Leadership

6. Educational Media Conferences for Instructional Supervision—Georgia, Alabama, Florida

D. Projects Designed to Develop and Introduce New Curicula and Instructional Materials

7. The Use of Technological Devices and Materials in Disadvantaged Classrooms
8. Minnesota Mathematics and Science Teaching Project

In addition to the 8 projects listed above, 13 additional projects were deemed by the review panel to be so significant and timely as to warrant funding by December 31, 1966.

Educational Research Information Center files of the U. S. Office of Education are being located in or near all 8 component service centers and in the central office of SEL. ERIC materials are for all educators in the region to use. The many, many programs for disadvantaged children and youth summarized in ERIC will help all of us build the most effective programs possible for disadvantaged children.

A weekly SEL newsletter also is in the design stage. This publication will summarize new laboratory activities, provide information about new educational materials as they become available, and will show a weekly schedule of SEL meetings around the region. An automated mailing list is presently being prepared and equipment acquired so that approximately 10,000 educators and friends of education in the region can regularly receive the SEL newsletter. The mailing list ultimately will include about 30,000 names.

LABORATORY LEADERSHIP

Professional staff members in each of the 8 component service centers of SEL are assisted by an Advisory Committee. These committees are composed of leading professional educators in the area and prominent lay citizens selected for their enthusiastic interest in education. The central office staff is assisted in its work by a Board of Directors. The Board meets monthly to formulate policies under which SEL operates. Members of the Board presently include the following individuals:

Dr. Robert E. Bills, Dean, College of Education, University of Alabama

Dr. J. C. Blair, Director of Secondary Education, State of Alabama

Dr. Horace M. Bond, Director, Bureau of Educational and Social Research, Atlanta University

Mr. Neil Davis, Editor, Auburn, Alabama

Mr. Clyde Kimball, Principal, Continental Colony Elementary School, Atlanta

Dr. Charles T. Lester, Dean, Graduate School of Arts and Sciences, Emory University

Dr. J. Stanley Marshall, Associate Dean, School of Education, Florida State University

Dr. Truman M. Pierce (President), Dean, School of Education, Auburn University

Dr. H. Titus Singletary, Jr., Associate State Superintendent of Schools, State of Georgia

Dr. Kimball Wiles (Vice-President), Dean, College of Education, University of Florida

Mr. Arthur Wolfe, Director, Nova Schools, Fort Lauderdale

Dr. J. A. Williams, Dean, School of Education, University of Georgia

To help make the impact of SEL programs regional in fact, a Regional Council also has been appointed. The Council meets semi-annually to critically review the status of SEL programs, and annually to elect the Board of Directors. The Regional Council's membership is broadly representative of various groups of people in the tri-state area who are concerned about improving education.

A LOOK AHEAD

For the immediate future SEL energy and resources will be focused upon:

1. Development and use across the region of Title I and III programs under the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.
2. Completion of a regional inventory of educational programs for deprived children and youth.
3. Development and utilization of curriculum and instructional material innovations in school classrooms across the region.
4. Development of professional educational personnel.

Three supporting services also will be undertaken simultaneously by SEL as the four activities above get underway. These services include:

1. Designing and implementing a regional educational data and evaluation system called SEED, Source of Essential Educational Data.
2. Disseminating ideas, information and materials for improvement of learning in educationally deprived classrooms.
3. Funding SEL activities.

A Bi-lingual Instructional Materials Program soon will be initiated under the auspices of SEL. This program aims to develop more effective textbooks and other teaching-learning tools for school children from Spanish speaking families. These new tools will be tailored for use by children of Cuban refugees in the region and their teachers. The tools also will be used in American schools abroad in Latin and South America. The program is financed by the U.S. Department of State and marks the beginning of a continuing working relationship between the Laboratory and that arm of the Federal government.

INTRODUCTION

This third edition of Education in the Fifty States has been completely revised and reorganized to include up-to-date figures and a great deal of new material. The various charts bring together information about education throughout the nation and in each of the fifty states.

As an illustration of how to use this handbook, we might take the state of Pennsylvania. From these charts one can learn that Pennsylvania is slightly above the national average in per capita income (Column A), but slightly below average in per pupil expenditure for elementary and secondary education (Column B). Pennsylvania therefore ranks low in "effort," that is in school expenditure as a percentage of personal income (Column C). Pennsylvania spends only 3.65% of its personal income on elementary and secondary schools, compared to the national average of 4.74%. By glancing through the chart, it can be seen that Pennsylvania is among the lowest states in effort. Pennsylvania, more easily than many states, could maintain adequate levels of educational expenditure. By committing 6.09% of its income to elementary and secondary education, less than several states are already doing, Pennsylvania could raise its per pupil expenditure to $800 (Column D), enough to pay teachers an average of $8,000 a year and to match New York State's average expenditure for other current needs. The average state would need to spend 7.83% of its income to accomplish the same result, and many states would need to commit more than a tenth of their income to education.

The state government provides 43.4% of educational expenditures in Pennsylvania, slightly higher than the national average (Column N), but considerably less than many other states do. Local communities pay 53.6% of school costs and Federal assistance accounts for only 2.8% of school costs. It should, of course, be noted that these figures are for a school year prior to the enactment of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.

Inadequate support for education is reflected in several ways. Teachers' salaries in Pennsylvania are below the national average (Column E), considerably lower than they should be in view of the resources of the state. A surprising 58.2% of the schools in Pennsylvania have no school library (Column G). Classroom shortages in Pennsylvania are severe. The state now has 79,500 classrooms in use (Column I), but 19,800 new classrooms are needed to replace substandard classrooms now in use (Column J) and an additional 16,900 classrooms are needed to bring class size down to 25 elementary and 20 secondary pupils to a room (Column K), making a total of 36,700 new classrooms needed in the state (Column L).

Dropouts in Pennsylvania are fewer than for the nation as a whole, with 80.8% of the ninth graders in public school going on to graduate from the twelfth grade (Column H). Columns R, S, and T tell the story of what happened to a typical group of 1000 Pennsylvania students who entered the ninth grade, either in public or non-public schools, in the fall of 1960. In 1964, 815 of them graduated from the twelfth grade, 185 of them having dropped out somewhere along the way. Of those who graduated, 309 entered their freshman year of college in the fall of 1964. In Nevada 528 of the original 1000 would have entered college and in California 724 of the original 1000 would have started college. These figures, computed by the AFL-CIO Education Department, have not been published prior to their appearance in this handbook.

With regard to higher education, Pennsylvania's per capita public expenditure is considerably below average, $6.29 as compared to the national average of $14.12 (Column U). Perhaps this partially explains the fact that fewer of Pennsylvania's high school graduates enter college than is the case in the average state, 38% in Pennsylvania as compared to 51% in the nation (Column V). Of the Pennsylvanians who do enter college, 22.4% go outside the state for their education, as compared with only 9.8% in Michigan and 5.4% in California (Column W).

Since the last edition of Education in the Fifty States, several important new programs of federal aid to education have been enacted. Some of the authorized appropriations for 1966 under these programs are given on pages 16 and 17. Pennsylvania is authorized to receive $56,501,000 for improving educational opportunity of disadvantaged children under Title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act; $9,410,000 under the Vocational Education Act of 1963; and $27,539,000 for student aid, academic facilities, and community extension services under the Higher Education Act of 1965.

As can be seen from the charts, many states with much less income are doing much both absolutely and relatively than Pennsylvania in elementary, secondary and higher education. Using these charts, this same kind of information can be obtained about each of the states. Some states, it will be discovered, are straining their resources to support their schools; others could do more. All in all, these charts add up to compelling statistical justification for full federal partnership in financing education from the elementary schools to the universities.

INEQUALITY OF EDUCATIONAL OPPORTUNITY PERSISTS

Although significant gains have been made in education over the past fifteen years, inequality of educational opportunity nevertheless persists. The above chart plots educational expenditures over a fifteen year period in the five states which were highest in their per pupil current expenditure in 1964-65 and the five states which were lowest in per pupil expenditure. As can be seen from the graph, the difference in the average expenditure of the five lowest and five highest states in 1949-50 was $213; by 1964-65 school year the difference had actually widened to $337. Per pupil expenditures in the five lowest states were $127 below the national average in 1949-50. By 1964-65 they were $194 below the national average. Dollar for dollar, inequality of educational opportunity has widened rather than narrowed over the last fifteen years.

(Note: All of these figures have been adjusted to constant dollars of the 1964-65 school year.)

In the United States as a whole, for example, 73.1% of the ninth graders of 1960-61 graduated in 1964. This means that approximately 26.9% of the ninth graders dropped out of school before graduating. However, certain factors other than dropping out are included. Among them are death and in some instances migration from the state.

Urban League Leader Warns That New Laws Leave Negro Still 'Outside'

Says Civil Rights Cr

Executive Director Whitney Young of the National Urban League was a principal speaker at the 1965 Washington Conference on Women's Activities, Legislation and Civil Rights held by the United Packinghouse, Food and Allied Workers, AFL-CIO, September 20-24, 1965. Following are excerpts from his remarks.

THIS occasion provides me an opportunity to see some longtime old friends. It also gives me a chance to express my respect and appreciation for what this particular International Union has done—the effort it has made under the able and understanding leadership of Ralph Helstein and your devoted Secretary-Treasurer, a contribution to the whole cause of civil rights that I want to publicly acknowledge.

I am pleased to be here because it is my impression that the truly crucial decisions about what America and American institutions and individuals are going to do in the field of civil rights and human relations is now upon us. What will happen in the next few months will largely determine whether America is up to this challenge, whether it in fact truly believes in a democratic society.

It will also tell us a whole lot about our institutions including labor, education and business. It will tell us a lot about individual Americans and to what degree we do really qualify as members of a society having a Judeo-Christian ethic and the democratic idea as expressed in the Constitution.

Now, to many of you this might come as some shock and surprise—even disappointment. I am sure the large bulk of Americans (and included in that group would be many Negro citizens) would like to feel that if these last three or four years have not been crucial years then they would hate to look forward to the next, thinking of all of the confrontations, the demonstrations, the marches, the violence (in some cases). And they would be thinking, also, that we now have on the books important and unprecedented legislation—the Civil Rights Act, a Voting Rights Act, a Poverty Act. They would be considering, too, that we now have a new attitude and a new policy on the part of major corporations in this country, and we have a reaffirmation in terms of policy statements from other institutions including labor unions. So, many of you can with a reasonable amount of validity feel that the crisis is over.

Cleaning Out Debris

I WOULD submit to you, however, that it is just beginning. What we have done with all of the Supreme Court decisions and the legislative changes and the new policy statements is but to clear out the debris, to remove the visible barriers which had no business to be there to begin with.

These things, as you must know, do not in and of themselves assure full-class citizenship. The passage of a bill does not automatically grant to a functional illiterate the necessary skills he must need in an automated society. So the actual facts at this moment, as dismal as they may sound, show that on the basic issues of meat, bread and potatoes, food, clothing and shelter, the Negro still stands far out on the periphery of the main stream of American life.

Economically, today, the average Negro family has a family income of about 56 percent of that of the average white family. In terms of unemployment—it is two and a half times to three times as great. Of the million kids in this country who are out of work and out of school between the ages of 16 and 21, 500,000 of these are Negro kids. This is 50 per cent, whereas they represent only 15 per cent of the population.

Sixty percent of all Negro families in the country have a family income of less than $3,000, 75 percent less than $4,000.

The average Negro child receives 3½ years less education. In health, the Negro parents die 7½ years sooner. This is what I mean by the meat, bread and potato issues. As excited as we may get, as grateful and appreciative as we are for the passage of these bills, we have to face reality. You don't take Title VII down to the A & P store. You have to take money to the A & P store.

Now, I think that we ought to be able to understand why this situation exists. The Negro is not a superior person, and, given the fact that he has suffered 350 years of denial and deprivation, gets the poorest kind of education, inferior housing, the lack of cultural opportunity, we must add the fact that his family was deliberately split and weakened by the society.

There is no way in the world for the Negro (any more than any other ethnic group in our society) to overnight remove the scars of those generations of deprivation. He is bound to be behind; and when a man is behind there is no way for him to catch up; unless you say he is a whole lot faster than I am, or unless you either slow the one guy down or push the other one along. What I am suggesting is that if America is to be honest, and not just try to set up the symbols and things to satisfy its conscience, then it has got to do more than to pass laws.

I have heard so many people, some Negroes included, who say rather glibly that other groups have faced deprivation and denial—"my old grandmother came to this country not knowing how to speak the language and not having any money and little education. Look what the Jew has done, the Italian, the Irishman. He has pulled himself up by the bootstraps."

There are many people who say this, and in the next breath say the Negro is suggesting that he must be treated different.

Legacy of Slavery

THE truth of the thing is the Negro is unique. He has had something happen to him that has happened to no other American citizen. One was that he had families deliberately destroyed by a society that wouldn't even let slaves get married. And, if they somehow managed to form a comman law relationship, when they sold them on the block they rarely sold that husband and wife together. And they always separated the children from the families except in Louisiana where there was a law that said that when you sold the slaves on the block you couldn't separate the child from the parents until they were ten years of age; but that was the only state where you had that kind of regulation.

Now, the society didn't do this accidently. It was done deliberately, because if you wanted to keep people weak and divided you have to destroy the institution that was best equipped to give stability and help people organize—the family. And it didn't stop a hundred years ago when we signed the Emancipation Proclamation, because even after that there was a conscious, deliberate effort to keep the Negro male humiliated and castrated, unemployed and everything else. That is one thing that no other ethnic group had done to it.

The other thing is that, unlike every other group, when they got to that little port of entry in the city where they had a chance to learn the language and get a little education and a little money, and learn how to take baths and all those things that the poor immigrant from Europe had to learn . . . when that immigrant from Europe got to that point he could then escape. He could get lost and move out into the large community. If he had difficulty because his name sounded funny, he just shortened it, you know, changed it. Many, many did. But the Negro couldn't do that. He scrubbed but he couldn't wash that color off. He was still a Negro.

Now, those things made for the Negro a unique situation and anybody, therefore, who stands up and says, "Well, I don't see why the Negro doesn't pull himself up like everybody else," may be saying that to satisfy his conscience, but he is not dealing with fact, and it is a sign of ignorance.

I ALSO know that the solution to removal of the invisible barriers calls for activity and responsibility on the part of the Negro citizens as much as the white. Now, the visible barriers have to be removed by white people because they put them up there to begin with, so it was their major responsibility to take them down. But when we talk about the invisible barriers we have to have teamwork, and the sooner we begin to see that this is no longer a struggle between white people and Negro people, this is a struggle of those people who would hold America back into the 19th and 18th Century, and those who want us to move ahead progressively, the better. It is a struggle between those who have and those who have not, even in the same society. It is a struggle in which we have got to recognize that poor people, whatever their color, have far more in common than they do by way of differences, and that poor white people and poor Negroes have an awful lot more in common than poor white people and the President of General Motors and United States Steel.

I don't think there is anything that has been more helpful for progressive legislation in this country than the civil rights movement. The civil rights movement has been the chief trigger that has brought us all of these programs we are now talking about . . . Federal Aid to Education, War on Poverty, Public Works Programs, all of these things. And they don't just help Negroes. Some poor people, even though some of these are the most hostile to Negro citizens, have the right to be the most grateful because their children are also getting a head start in life, their children are also benefiting from improved federal aid to education. They are benefiting from all of the poverty programs.

Labor Showed the Way

NOW, what about this role of labor? I think the first thing that labor has to do is to understand, and be the first to say it, that they understand what the revolution is all about. When I hear labor people sit around and talk about, "I wish these people would quit demonstrating and sitting in," and "this terrible violence, why don't they quit marching," it really annoys me. I know all about the struggles the labor movement went through, and I know about Green and Murray, and I know what Ralph Helstein and you have done—if not you, the people in your past. We have not done a single thing unique in the civil rights movement in this country that other groups at other points in history didn't do when they felt themselves discriminated against.

risis Is Not Yet Over

Sees Entry of Negroes Into 'Bread & Butter' Of Life as Key Issue

Civil disobedience didn't begin with Jim Farmer in court. It began with the Boston Tea Party, and the people who participated in it are now heroes in history. You remember the suffrage movement, women fighting for the right to vote. Certainly you remember the struggle of the labor movement. You remember the violence of Republic Steel. You remember the sit-ins, and the picketing, and the boycotting.

We learned from you, from the labor movement. And you didn't stop until you got the Wagner Act in 1935, until you got recognition from the companies. And then you continued (but in a little more dignified way); but don't you ever forget that you would not be where you are today if you were not engaged in those same activities — and don't try to get so respectable!

I would also suggest that you not only remember your history, but think a little bit about your future and your destiny. I am convinced that when the time comes that the union movement stops identifying itself with the underdog, the moment you stop becoming reformists, the moment you stop being in the forefront of social legislation (or, to put it negatively, the moment you become just protective organizations concerned only about your membership), then the labor movement in this country is through.

Labor Needs Friends

THE moment you aren't carrying that flag for that little guy, whether he is a member of your union or not, then the labor movement has lost most of its political friends, most of its political impact. That I submit to you, my friends, is the reason that most liberals and most minority groups have identified with the labor movement. Because they felt you were for the little guy. If you lose that, then your own destiny is at stake; because, if you don't have friends out there who will also support labor in the legislative halls and with the administration, you are in serious trouble.

Now, I think your first challenge is to be sure that your own family is straight, you know. One of the dangers that I see happening so often is that the labor movement has a smugness and complacency not related to what it is doing now but in relation to what it used to do.

At one point, the labor movement was miles ahead in its social perceptions. That is no longer true, and it isn't because management has gone so fast itself, it is that you slowed down so much.

You ought to be raising sand about these unions, these building trade unions that have one or two or no Negro apprentices. We can count on one hand, almost, the number of apprentices in the Plumbers and Sheet Metal Workers. And many of the other unions don't have Negroes on their board of directors.

The other thing is that for an individual union like this one that is so far ahead of, not only management but, as far as I am concerned, any other labor union, that doesn't necessarily mean that you are so good. It often means that the others are so bad that you are less bad.

Just a 'Kitten' in the Tank

NOW, you need to provide the leadership that you once did, and here I am thinking about programs. Sure, the war on poverty was a very important bit of legislation, but it is not a tiger in your tank. It is more like a kitten in your tank. We talk about taking thirty-five million people out of poverty. We spent in Europe in the Marshall plan $17 billion in a four-year period. For one shot to the moon we spent $20 billion. Yet we settle now for even less than two billion dollars to lift 35 million people out of poverty in the most affluent society the world has ever known. So we have got to push for more.

We ought to be pushing for housing programs. Not just public housing that people rent, but we ought to be pushing for private housing that poor people can buy without down payment and use that money they are now paying for rent to build up equity, like we did for the G.I. who suffered for the country. The people I am talking about have really suffered for the country too.

We ought not to settle for medical care for our people over age sixty-five. No American should die sooner than he must or should suffer more than he need because he is broke, because he doesn't have money to go to the best specialist and get the best doctor, whatever his age, and you ought to be fighting for this.

A $2 minimum wage. Of course you fight for it. That is just a little bit over poverty. Why is it that laundry workers and domestic workers and agricultural workers are not even covered by that $1.25 minimum wage that the government has at least called for?

Some people actually earn seventy-five cents an hour, some less in our society today. You ought to be pushing for those things, expanded welfare programs. A man should not have to go to an agency and humiliate himself and grovel and beg to get a pittance. We make them chronic dependents, we demoralize people. We take a man who is ambitious but who runs into a streak of bad luck because of automation or something else and we give him so little and so late, and in such humiliating manner, that he reaches the point he doesn't give a damn.

Negroes Need a Lift

THERE is no way in the world that we are going to do anything about strengthening the Negro family until we start giving the Negro male the opportunity to be the provider in his home; or else he isn't going to stand very tall in front of his children and in front of his wife, especially in the kind of society in which we live.

What I am really suggesting to you here is that particularly for the Negro citizen we have got to have a special effort for a brief period of time. I am not asking for equal time. I am not asking for 300 years of preferential treatment like white people had. I am saying for 10 years we have got to consciously say to the Negro population of this country, "Somewhere along the way you have been done a disservice and we have got to correct it." There has got to be some compensatory activity. There has got to be some indemnification, if you will, some re-creation, or something like we did for the Cuban refugees. We did it for the people escaping Krushchev. We did it for the returning veteran because he had been out of the main stream.

I make no apologies today. This is just being honest and fair. If this hand is infected and this one isn't, it is not preferential treatment to put penicillin in this hand until it gets up to the health of the other hand. If you don't, in time that whole body is going to be infected — and you better believe it.

We spent $3.5 million dollars this summer on one project in Harlem that employed some 3,500 kids who last summer were throwing rocks. This summer they were throwing shovels of dirt, cleaning up, fixing up. In one three or four-day period in Los Angeles they spent $170 million dollars in damages and people say it was terrible, terrible what these Negroes are doing.

Don't forget that of the 37 people killed, 36 of them were Negroes; and don't forget it was a Negro community that was mainly destroyed. When anybody comes up and says he isn't going to support the civil rights movement because of Los Angeles, all I can say to that person is that if the Negro community has not generalized about all white people being evil, based on their experiences with the Klan, based on the fact that some white people bombed their children in Birmingham, then Lord knows that the white community must not generalize about the Negro because some few people get desperate and do things that are wrong.

This is important because an awful lot of people today are saying, "I'm disenchanted with the civil rights movement because of violence." I didn't get disenchanted with the labor movement when it engaged in violence. These things sometimes happen.

World Is the Loser

WHAT this world has lost out of our inability to see beneath the thin layer of a man's skin! What we have denied to this world because we have taken some 70 per cent of the world population and left their talent to go to waste — because we couldn't take our blinders off!

We could have had a cure for cancer. We might have had a cure for heart trouble, we might have had a cure for the common cold. But this is negative to think about the past. What I am thinking about now is the future, the potential that exists in this world, if only we are willing to take these people from whatever country—and certainly within our own country — and see in that little child greatness which can benefit all mankind.

Look what we stand to gain. But don't do it just because we want to find a cure for cancer and we want to effect a better economic well being. Do it because in the final analysis it is a test of you as a human being. You see, what UPWA does as an organization, what America does as a nation, basically boils down to what you as individuals feel and are willing to say and do on the basis of courage and conviction. But, you aren't going to do much if you are insensitive to other human beings, if you have the inability to put yourself in the place of another human being who is a mother or father, who has the same hopes and dreams for themselves and for their children as anybody else. Unless you are somehow going to be able to feel with those people, and to say, "There but for the Grace of God go I," then nothing much is really going to happen.

An Inner Confrontation

IF YOU are fearful because you feel you will be ostracized, or criticized, or isolated for defending poor people, then nothing much is going to happen. This is a test of you as a person. And what kind of a human being are you? Are you a robot that just smiles when the button is pushed? Are you somebody who cares? Do you just care about yourself and your own family? Are you ready to extend yourself? That is what gives meaning to life, and that is the difference between real human beings and just a bunch of vegetables sitting around with clothes on.

Now, your union has the legacy. You have the heritage. You were born to be great and to give to this country this kind of human quality many of your forefathers gave. I have confidence that you too will do likewise.

Thank you very much.

EMPLOYMENT

A Counselor's Guide to Federal Aid Programs

The Federal Government offers a wide variety of occupational and educational assistance to help people—particularly youths—prepare for, begin, or continue their participation in the work force. Assistance ranges from basic education and job information to vocational training and work experience. Here is a capsule view of selected recent legislation showing some programs that are available, who qualifies for them, and where to get additional information.

PROGRAM	FOR WHOM	PROVISIONS	SOURCES OF ADDITIONAL INFORMATION
Youth Opportunity Centers (established within the U.S. Employment Service System).	Youths, ages 16 through 21.....	Provides a focal point for efforts to aid youth. Supporting technical and developmental services provided on three major fronts: (1) preparation for employment, (2) development of job opportunities, and (3) placement in a suitable job.	Local Youth Opportunity Center. Local Employment Service Office. Youth Opportunity Centers, Bureau of Employment Security, U.S. Employment Service, Washington, D.C., 20212. Request Fact Sheets about Youth Opportunity Centers.
Higher Education Act of 1965.....	Undergraduate college students and graduate students training for teaching.	Provides for scholarships of up to $800 based on need; up to $1,000 based on need and academic standing in high school. Interest free loans provided while in school, with low interest provisions following graduation. Work-study programs expanded to include needy students. Graduate fellowships provided for students preparing for elementary-secondary teaching careers.	Public Inquiry Branch, U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare, Washington, D.C. 20201.
Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965:			Local Superintendent of Schools. State Director of Guidance Service.
Grants to Local Public School Districts to Broaden and Strengthen Elementary and Secondary School Programs—Title I.	Educationally deprived children living in school districts having high concentration of low-income families.	Grants for educational projects as determined by local educational agencies.	Bureau of Educational Assistance Programs, U.S. Office of Education, Washington, D.C., 20202. Request reprint, The First Work of These Times.
School Library Resources, Textbooks, and other Instructional Materials—Title II.	Elementary and secondary schools.	Financial assistance makes library resources, textbooks, and other published materials available.
Supplemental Educational Centers and Services—Title III.	Elementary and secondary schools.	Grants for supplementary enrichment programs in guidance, remedial instruction, school health, psychological and social work services, and special programs when schools are not in session. Model or exemplary demonstration projects may be established.
Economic Opportunity Act of 1964:
Job Corps-Youth Programs—Title I, Pt. A.	Out of school and unemployed youths, ages 16 through 21, lacking education and skills for jobs.	Establishes residential centers providing a coordinated program of basic education, skill training, and constructive work experience. We Near Bottom of Manpower Barrel

By DAVID R. JONES

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 12—President Johnson sent to Congress this week a green-covered report on a subject destined to occupy more of his attention in the months ahead: manpower.

The 229-page document was stuffed with forbidding charts and complex economic comment, but it contained one point of particular signficance to everyone. The booming economy has reached the point, it said, where the nation is starting to run short of workers.

This is an important development, because as the present labor shortages spread, which they are expected to do, they are certain to add to the inflationary pressures in the economy. This in turn will influence what the Johnson Administration does about such matters as raising taxes, or eventually heading toward wage-price controls.

Major labor shortages feed inflation in two ways. They can force employers to bid against each other for workers, or to hire less-productive workers, which pushes up labor costs. And they can create bottlenecks that limit production, encouraging companies to raise prices because they are enjoying strong demand.

The tightening labor supply was underscored this week when the Department of Labor reported that the nation's unemployment dropped in February to 3.7 per cent of the labor force. That was down from 5 per cent a year earlier, and the lowest level since the jobless rate stood at 3.5 per cent in November, 1953.

Government experts admit that "there are numerous indications of developing labor stringencies." But they insist that these have been limited so far to a few industries, occupations and areas. They assert that "at the present time there is little evidence of a general labor shortage" of the kind that would create significant production jams or force widespread bidding for workers.

Where Help Is Wanted

Arthur M. Ross, Commissioner of Labor Statistics, says the tightest job markets are in the Great Lakes region—including Chicago, Detroit, Milwaukee and Cleveland—where heavy manufacturing is centered and unemployment is estimated below 2.5 per cent.

Qualified workers are hardest to find in the metalworking, machinery, construction and defense-oriented industries. There is a scarcity of low-paid retail, medical and household service workers. Employers are lamenting a shortage of engineers, scientists and mathematicians.

On the other hand, Mr. Ross points out, the job markets are much looser in New England, and in such West Coast cities as Los Angeles, San Diego and San Francisco. Joblessness still stands at 10.9 per cent among teenagers, and 7 per cent among Negroes.

"Up to now, employment is still growing at a rate about 250,000 more than seasonal every month," Mr. Ross said. "This indicates to me that we still have the manpower potential for further expansion."

There still were 3.2-million unemployed in February, of whom 2.6-million were seeking full-time jobs. One-third of those seeking full-time work were adult men, and all but 200,000 of the 2.6-million had previous full-time experience. Moreover, the U.S. labor force will grow by 1.6-million this year, and jobs must be found for these people.

These gross figures do not tell the full story, however. Many of those still unemployed either live in a locality where jobs are not available, or lack the specific skills necessary to find work.

Meantime, the unemployment rate is falling faster than most economists had expected. The jobless rate is hurtling toward the level—between 2.5 per cent and 3 per cent—that is considered "full" employment. That much joblessness is considered irreducible because of seasonal factors and normal job-changing.

Effect on Wage Rates

There is evidence that manpower shortages already are having some inflationary impact. Non-union wage increases in some areas have begun to outstrip union gains, indicating employers are starting to raise pay voluntarily to keep from losing workers.

Government officials are alert to these trends, and they expect the situation to grow more severe. So they are accelerating efforts to gather more information to pinpoint the problem areas, to locate job vacancies and ways to fill them. They also are stepping up Federal manpower programs, which will train 250,000 workers this year in needed skills. Employers finally are beginning to step up their own training programs to ease shortages.

President Johnson emphasized the need to offer more training, and to redesign jobs so they can be done with less skill, in his manpower message this week. He urged employers to consider hiring more women, Negroes, handicapped people and skilled immigrants to fill worker gaps.

The most severe challenge lying ahead for government and business thus is not merely finding workers, but in providing them with the proper skills to match the available jobs.

Some economists think that it may be touch-and-go before 1966 is over.

Wirtz Urges Continued Efforts To Cut the Unemployment Rate

3/15/66 — EMPLOYMENT

By DAVID R. JONES

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 14—Secretary of Labor W. Willard Wirtz, saying it was "cockeyed" to worry that the unemployment rate was getting too low, today urged continued efforts to cut the rate still further.

Mr. Wirtz acknowledged that the decline in the jobless rate to 3.7 per cent of the labor force last month contributed to the "tightening manpower situation." But he said that proper job training could solve that problem and he said full employment would not be achieved until the rate reached "about 2.5 per cent."

The Johnson Administration has grown increasingly watchful of declining unemployment. While Government officials have not suggested that the rate is too low, the continued decline is causing manpower shortages and is threatening production bottlenecks that could feed inflationary pressures.

Mr. Wirtz's comments today indicated that he believed the rate could be reduced further without undue inflation if the Government and private employers did enough to train the available workers in skills where shortages existed.

"There's manpower available, we've got to train it," Mr. Wirtz asserted. "If we don't, we'll have trouble. If we do [train it], we won't have trouble."

Mr. Wirtz's estimate that full employment would be reached when the jobless rate hit 2.5 per cent was the Administration's lowest public estimate yet on that point. He and other Government officials lately have been estimating that full employment would be reached when the jobless rate was between 2.5 per cent and 3 per cent. Economists agree that unemployment cannot be totally eliminated because of seasonal work patterns and normal job changing.

WIRTZ MINIMIZES MANPOWER FEAR

The labor secretary brushed aside a recent suggestion from the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations that the Administration should set an "interim" unemployment goal of 3 per cent. The Kennedy Administration in 1961 set an interim goal of 4 per cent unemployment, and that figure was reached in January.

"I've never believed much in interim goals of any kind," Mr. Wirtz said, because, he contended, they tend to become confused with ultimate goals. He said he would have "No objection" to a new interim target, but he added that the Government should strive to push the figure as low as possible regardless of the interim goal.

Contracts For Training

Mr. Wirtz made his remarks on the manpower situation after signing a contract with the National Tool, Die and Precision Machining Association to provide $521,287 in Federal funds to train 1,800 machinists and tool and die workers. He also signed a contract with the National Urban League providing $56,680 in Federal funds to fight urban unemployment.

Meanwhile, M. Clair Miller, chairman of the labor committee of the Associated General Contractors of America, complained about severe manpower shortages in contract construction. He said those shortages were encouraging unions to seek inflationary wage settlements.

Mr. Miller, interviewed at the Association's annual convention here, said the labor committee last Friday passed a resolution asserting that construction labor settlements were "making a mockery" of President Johnson's efforts to control inflation.

The committee also passed a resolution saying it was "deeply concerned about the growing shortage of skilled workmen within the construction industry."

Mr. Wirtz said today's contract with the Urban League would enable that organization to encourage local chapters to work with Government agencies in the human resources development program. The Urban League already has been working in five cities on that program, which searches out unemployed individuals and seeks to find jobs for them.

Held in Husband's Death

PASSAIC, N. J., March 14 (AP)—Mrs. Irene Streelman, mother of five girls, has been charged with murder for the fatal stabbing of her 50-year-old husband, Jerry. The police said she told them he was stabbed during a struggle that erupted from a domestic quarrel yesterday morning in their apartment at 201 Sixth Street. Mrs. Streelman is 50 and her daughters 10 to 18 years old.

UNIVERSITIES BAR RACE DATA TO U.S.

Education Office Seeks Way to Check on Minorities

By JOHN HERBERS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 14—A number of colleges and universities, including large Eastern ones, have refused to tell the Office of Education how many Negroes and other nonwhite students they have.

The office is in a quandary over how to obtain the information, which it says is needed from time to time to determine how minority groups are doing in higher education.

Alexander M. Mood, assistant commissioner for educational statistics, said the office may have to hire a company to determine the racial makeup of the campuses by scientific sampling. All other information on enrollment is obtained routinely through questionnaires mailed to the schools.

Mr. Mood said about 100 institutions had balked at questions about racial makeup. He said some of the universities had warned that there would be even more refusals next year if the questions were repeated.

Role of 'God' Barred

At Syracuse University, Edwin D. Smith, the registrar, complained that the Office of Education wanted him to "play God" in determining who is black, yellow, red or white. He said it would be a violation of state and Federal law to obtain the race of each student, "not to mention a higher moral law."

Other universities that have declined to furnish racial information include Columbia, New York, Cornell, St. John's, Rochester, Boston and Rutgers, Mr. Smith said.

The situation points up a growing dilemma for the Federal Government. In enforcing laws and policies intended to make men and institutions color blind, it is having to require some color consciousness in order to identify and correct the more subtle forms of discrimination.

A study of de facto school desegregation ordered by President Johnson and soon to be undertaken by the Civil Rights Commission will require statistics on racial makeup that have not been kept for years, if ever.

The Civil Service Commission recently announced that it would soon require all Federal employes to fill out special forms designating their race so the commission can tell how well it is doing in employing minority groups.

Keeping employe records by race was stopped by the Federal Government years ago in the belief the practice fostered discrimination. The number of Negroes in the Federal service has since been estimated by a face count.

The Labor Department has been considering for some time having the state employment services list the race of job applicants to help enforce the fair employment practices section of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Mr. Mood said the universities had been asked to estimate the number of Negroes and nonwhites if they did not care to make a head count. But other officials objected to this, too. They said the office was collecting "statistically unsound" information, Mr. Mood explained.

Some Government sources suggested that some of the liberal establishments were sensitive about their record of recruiting Negro students and did not want to be put on the spot.

Mr. Mood said the information had never been intended to determine whether the school was complying with civil rights laws and executive orders. He said the institutions, therefore, could not be forced to supply the information.

South Unsurpassed in Drive On Job Bias, Says FDR Jr.

AC 4/12/66

By MARGARET HURST

There is no section of the country more determined to practice equality in employment than the South, Franklin D. Roosevelt Jr. said here Monday.

He said that in his travels as chairman of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) he has found that no section of the U.S. is more guilty of discrimination than another.

Speaking to the Atlanta Rotary Club, Roosevelt said that if his only job were to see that members of minority groups get jobs he could "go out of business almost immediately."

But, he said, the big problem facing the EEOC is the inadequate training and education of minority groups.

The degree of their education makes it practically impossible to give them the training necessary to get a job in this highly technological and industrial environment, Roosevelt said.

"The challenge in education today," he said, "is to develop new techniques of remedial education."

He said that "industry after industry" plans for the raw material they will need in 30 years, but they do not plan for the human material. He told the Rotarians that business must find out what jobs will be needed in the next 30 years and then train unskilled persons to fill these jobs.

"For 30 years I've been observing government," Roosevelt said, "and one conclusion I've come to is that government always moves into a vacuum." He said that if businessmen don't find out what jobs will be needed and train persons for them, they will leave "just more vacuum where government can move in and send you just one more form every month to fill out."

He said 82 per cent of the unemployed are unskilled. He said if this group were trained and employed it would create a $21 billion market . . . one that no good businessman is likely to overlook.

Roosevelt praised Atlanta's progress and said, "I'm going to take my hat off to you . . . not just for building sky scrapers and industry, but for concerning yourselves about the arts." He said the quality of Atlanta's leadership is reflected in their concern with developing the arts.

Roosevelt left Monday afternoon for Warm Springs, where he is scheduled to participate in Tuesday's dedication ceremonies for Meriwether County's newly

THE ATLANTA CONSTITUTIO

Labor Market Here One of the Tightest

Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON—Atlanta has one of the tightest labor markets in the country, the U.S. Department of Labor reported Wednesday.

The report said Atlanta and five other metropolitan areas of more than one million population had unemployment rates of less than 3 per cent in April.

However, the Labor department report said, "Although regular reports from the major employment centers show a continued downward trend in unemployment rates, there are as yet no major areas which warrant classification in the overall labor shortage category, defined by an unemployment rate of 1.5 per cent or less."

PRESIDENT ASKS TALLY

This was the second monthly report on manpower shortages and reserves in response to President Lyndon B. Johnson's request to keep tabs on the labor market.

Nationally, the Labor department reported, jobs in the nonagricultural category rose by 650,000 from March to April.

The job increase since April 1965 has been almost three million nationwide.

"Increases of this magnitude indicate that employers are still able to staff new positions and maintain a rapid rate of economic growth," said the report.

OTHER AREAS LISTED

Other large metropolitan areas with unemployment rates under 3 per cent but still more than 1.5 per cent were Washington, D.C., Minneapolis-St. Paul, Cleveland, Houston and Milwaukee.

The report said the most serious shortage of manpower was in machinery manufacturing.

The report said the industry most affected by placement of new defense contracts is aircraft. Lockheed-Georgia in Marietta received the largest of the aircraft contracts, $2 billion for development of the C-5A transport.

U. S. Says Nonwhites Must Fill More Skilled Posts

NYT 6/4/66

WASHINGTON, June 3 (AP) —The Labor Department said in a report issued today that Negroes gained substantial ground in employment in the last 10 years but could lose most of it by 1975 unless they won a bigger share of white-collar and skilled jobs.

The employment of Negroes and other nonwhites increased from 6.4 million to 7.7 million since 1955, a much faster rate of growth than for white workers, according to the report by Joe L. Russell of the Bureau of Labor Statistics in the monthly labor review.

This brought the ratio of nonwhite workers to total employment from 10.2 per cent in 1955 to 10.7 per cent in 1965, the report said.

"Nevertheless, nonwhite workers continue to be disproportionately concentrated in less skilled blue-collar and service occupations," the report said.

If nonwhites continue to hold the same proportion of jobs, their ratio of total employment will slip back to 10.3 per cent by 1975, the report said, and their unemployment rate could be doubled because of the growing population.

Impact of Bias

Despite the 10-year growth in jobs, unemployment for nonwhites averaged at least twice the rate for white workers and will be reduced in the future only if Government and private job training programs and new laws against employment discrimination have a major impact, Mr. Russell said.

The low-skilled occupations in which Negroes and other nonwhite workers are largely concentrated are expected to grow more slowly than other jobs, he said.

More than half the 1.3 million gain in nonwhite employment the last 10 years was in white-collar jobs but still, less than one-fifth of all employed nonwhites held such jobs compared with nearly one-half of all employed white workers, the report said.

Nonwhites have made the most headway in teaching jobs, where they equal the number of white teachers in elementary and secondary schools, the report said.

Another area of significant gains for nonwhites was in clerical jobs, such as postal clerks, telephone operators, stock clerks, office machine operators and cashiers, the report said, as the nonwhite ratio rose from 3.8 per cent to 5.7 per cent.

The employment of nonwhite craftsmen, much of it in construction work, increased from 4 per cent to 5.6 per cent, the report said.

CIVIL SERVICE DATA ON RACE QUESTIONED

WASHINGTON, June 3 (AP) —Senator Sam J. Ervin Jr., Democrat of North Carolina, said today he had asked the Civil Service Commission to reconsider its new policy of asking Federal employes and job applicants to list their race and ancestry.

He said letters and telegrams received by the Senate Constitutional Rights Subcommittee that he heads indicated widespread concern "over the Government invasion of personal privacy represented by this questionnaire."

In reply to an earlier inquiry by Senator Ervin about the questionnaire, John W. Macy Jr., the commission chairman, said the purpose was to obtain data "to help determine those areas of Federal employment in which there may be denial to minority group members of an equal opportunity for employment."

Mr. Macy said:

"There is no intent to compromise the principle of open competition for Civil Service jobs in any way or to establish a quota system for any group.

In a reply urging reconsideration, Senator Ervin said:

"I fear that this ultimately may be the unavoidable result of such a process as you are inaugurating."

STUDY CITES GAINS IN HIRING NEGROES

U.S. Companies Employing More, but Survey Finds Strides Are Still Slow

By DOUGLAS W. CRAY

American companies are hiring more Negro employes, but strides in Negro employment are still slow, the National Industrial Conference Board reported yesterday.

In a two-volume study of the hiring attitudes and practices of 47 companies throughout the United States, the board found that far fewer problems had been encountered in hiring Negroes than had been anticipated.

The study also showed that many Negroes continue to receive only low-paying, low-status jobs and that well-qualified Negroes are still hard to find.

The impetus for a number of the special programs established by companies to revise their hiring practices came from the passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. It became effective on July 2, 1965, and makes it unlawful for an employer, an employment agency and a labor union to discriminate on the basis of race, color, sex, religion and national origin.

But the board's study indicated that the law itself is not the only factor at work in the field. As Francis G. Fabian, president of Hunt Foods and Industries, Inc., told the board's interviewing team:

"If the law were repealed tomorrow, we'd keep our policy and plan for action because it's not only right but we've gone through a lot to get it. But, I think governmental inspection of our plants and facilities is an asset. We all need prodding. I'll certainly keep prodding as long as I'm chief executive officer. Someone at the top has to believe in this and push it or it just won't go."

Other corporate presidents echoed the view that it takes a strong and continued push from the top to make certain that the legend, "An Equal Opportunity Employer," is not just so many words.

As the board notes: "Companies that have made most progress in employing Negroes report that a strong written policy statement on equal opportunity is needed to attract qualified applicants; also, a vigorous and sustained program of affirmative action, and adequate control to check on and insure achievement of the company's intent."

Ford Foundation Grant

The study, financed by a $195,000 Ford Foundation grant, was made between July, 1964, and January of this year. Published in two volumes, it presents background information on the nonwhite employment picture in general and thorough case studies of the participating companies.

Fourteen of the companies employed less than 5,000 persons and 16 employed more than 25,000. Thirty-three manufacturers are represented and others include banks, transportation, merchandising and other nonmanufacturing concerns.

"The scope of this study," said N. Bruce Palmer, president of the N. I. C. B., a nonprofit, fact-finding institution, "goes beyond strictly business considerations. It will not tell the executive what role he should play in Negro employment, but it will tell him what role others are playing and what role he can play if he chooses. And it will tell him what has worked so far and what has not."

As the study notes, about 6 million of the more than 20 million Negroes in the United States are gainfully employed and close to another million are looking for work.

Employment Rates Cited

The nonwhite unemployment rate has been more than double that of white workers for the last decade. In 1955, for example, the unemployment rate for whites was 3.6 per cent and the rate for nonwhites was 7.9 per cent. In 1964 the rate for whites was 4.6 per cent compared with 9.8 per cent for nonwhites.

A similar pattern shows up insofar as Negro earnings are concerned. A majority of Negro families ((six in 10) earns less than $4,000 a year, well below, the board points out, the $6,140 deemed "modest but adequate." for a family of four by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. The average Negro earns slightly more than one-half as much as the average white worker.

On the basis of its study, the board has drawn a number of conclusions. Among them are:

"Few companies are doing as well with Negro employment as they want to do. And few are doing as well as their top executives think they are doing. Also, many top-level executives think the Negro is making more economic progress than he, in fact, is making."

"Negroes are rated 'average' workers in most respects by those executives surveyed, but somewhat low on promotability and taking responsibility. With more education and training, most companies surveyed believe the Negro will improve his position in both areas."

"Generally, Negroes are screened for positions in the companies surveyed in the same way as other applicants. But a number of these companies make adjustments in interpreting test scores, especially in cases involving candidates from impoverished backgrounds."

"Most companies strongly oppose the idea of hiring Negroes by quota, believing it violates the principle of merit employment."

"Virtually all companies in the study have at least one Negro in a supervisory capacity. Very few firms express hard-core resistance to Negro hiring.

"Civil Rights legislation has produced dramatic changes in the South, mostly in curbing 'separate but equal' practices. Still, employes in some plants continue to use facilities on a segregated basis. While most firms feel that legislation produces some progress toward equal opportunity, they stress that the rest depends upon education and voluntary effort."

Another point that came up repeatedly in the investigations was the realization that pressure on American business to hire increased numbers of Negroes came along practically "overnight." Many concerns were simpy not prepared to meet it. Most feel they will still need guidance in this area for some time to come.

There remains a feeling on the part of many Negroes that companies are not genuinely interested in having them apply for work. To overcome this, companies have begun running advertisements in Negro publications, sending executives to address schools with large Negro enrollments and stepping up recruiting efforts at Negro colleges.

Thirty-eight of the companies in the survey were able and willing to report the numbers of Negroes on their payrolls. These companies employed 63,946 Negroes, or 6.98 per cent of the companies' total employment of 915,308.

EMPLOYMENT ADS SAID TO SHOW BIAS

75 Advertisers Are Cited by Federal Commission

8/10/66

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Aug. 9—The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission announced today it had charged 75 advertisers with unlawful discrimination in newspaper help-wanted columns.

The commission took the action under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which forbids discrimination in employment because of race, religion, sex or national origin.

Dr. Luther Holcomb, acting chairman of the commission, said the charges grew out of a study of 18,000 help-wanted ads in 21 newspapers across the country.

Those charged were said to have sponsored ads that seemed to violate guidelines that the commission issued on help-wanted advertising several months ago.

The newspapers carrying the advertisements were not charged in the complaints. The commission said it could not lawfully disclose the names of the advertisers.

Individual Complaints

Under the law, the commission as well as individual citizens can file complaints of discrimination in employment. In either case the commission is to follow this procedure: first there is an investigation by commission staff members. If the commission finds "reasonable cause" after investigation, the commission must attempt to end discrimination by conciliation.

If conciliation fails, the complainant can seek relief through the courts or the Attorney General can bring suit to end a "pattern of practice."

In the current cases, the commission's next step is to investigate its complaints against the advertisers.

"The commission is launching a campaign against classified ad violations of Title VII," Dr. Holcomb said. "We will continue to pursue such violations and we urge both advertisers and newspapers to cooperate with us in eliminating discrimination in this area."

Sex Most Obvious Form

The commission said the most obvious form of discrimination found in the survey was on the basis of sex. In its guidelines, the commission said help-wanted ads could be placed in columns marked "male" or "female" but that an advertiser could not state his preference in the individual ads, unless he was prepared to show that one sex or the other was needed for the normal operation of his business.

Following are examples of ads the commission found objectionable: "Ambitious men to train for manager positions." "lady in charge." "man age 22 to 25" "sales position for men."

Examples the commission said violated the law on the basis of race, religion or national origin included: "white attendant." "Anglo carhop." Catholic sales." "Middle-aged Latin-American."

If the advertisers can show that sex, race, national origin or religion is necessary to their businesses, the charges will be droopped.

EMPLOYMENT

Negro Jobless Up—Why?

9/11/66 NYT

By EILEEN SHANAHAN

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Sept. 10—With everything that has been done in the past few years to improve the lot of the Negro in America, is his job situation nevertheless actually getting worse?

So informed an expert as Arthur M. Ross, the head of the Government's Bureau of Labor Statistics, thinks that it is. Mr. Ross cites the unemployment figures compiled by the experts in his own agency to support his view that Negro workers in recent months have benefited neither from the specific efforts made in their behalf, nor from the general prosperity of the nation.

For all practical purposes, Negro unemployment has not budged this year. There are still nearly a quarter of a million Negroes out of work and actively seeking jobs—the Government's definition of "unemployment."

But in one key sense, the job situation of the Negro has actually deteriorated over the past 12 months, and particularly over the past four. The Negro unemployment rate — the percentage of all those unable to find work as compared to the total number of Negro workers — has been rising. At the same time, the white unemployment rate has been falling or remained at the least, stable.

As far back as the statistics go on unemployment by race, which is to 1948, Negroes have always had a disproportionate share of unemployment. Their rate of unemployment has been, generally, a bit more than twice as large as the white rate, in good times or bad. When 3½ per cent of the white persons who wanted work were jobless, somewhat more than 7 per cent of the Negroes were unemployed. When the rate for whites leapt up to 6 per cent, for example, in a recession, the Negro rate went above 12 per cent.

The ratio has been remarkably constant. Labor Department figures, taken on a quarterly rather than a monthly basis to smooth out some of the meaninglyless gyrations in monthly statistics, show this. Since 1957 (which is simply as far back as this particular set of figures go) the rtaio of Negro to white unemployment has almost always moved in the narrow range of 1.9 to 2.2 times as large, of the total of 39 calendar quarters covered by these figures, there are only three in which the rate was outside this range. Twice the Negro unemployment rate rose to 2.3 times the white rate and once to 2.4 times.

In July and August of this year the ratio again hit 2.4. The problem is that nobody knows why.

Experts have no one explanation for the rise, but studies of Negro unemployment patterns would make one thing certain. The current rise does not reflect a white backlash to the recent Negro protest movement.

There is a possibility that the figures are, for some reason, inaccurate and that in another couple of months the alarm that was raised by Mr. Rose will prove to have been a false one. This is what some of Mr. Ross's own experts in the Bureau of Labor Statistics believe. There have been similar alarms in the past, which have proved unfounded.

The statistics could be wrong, the experts agree, because of the manner in which they ar e gathered. The Labor Department's unemployment figures are based on a sample that is supposed to be representative of the entire population. Only 3,500 households are covered by the sample, however, and while this is a huge sample, as statistical sampling techniques go, it is still very small for purposes of identifying the unemployed by subcategory, such as race. Negroes now constitute about one-ninth of the U.S. population, and thus the sample is only one-ninth Negro, a small number.

The possibility of sampling errors aside, the long-term trends in Negro unemployment are somewhat mystifying to the experts. They do not move precisely with the trend in white unemployment, nor against it. While Negro unemployment, like white unemployment, does go up in booms and down in recessions, the relationship between the two does not seem to be particularly influenced by business cycles.

Common sense would hold that Negroes being "last hired, first fired" would be hurt relatively more than whites in recessions and helped relatively more by booms. But the statistics do not support this bit of common sense.

It is the failure of the present boom, of unprecedented length in peacetime, to sop up a greater proportion of Negro unemployment that has alarmed Mr. Ross and those who share his views. It looked for a while, in 1965, that the gap between Negro and white unemployment was narrowing and this was taken as a sign that a prolonged boom would, indeed, ultimately help Negroes more than whites. It now turns out that it hasn't—this much is completely clear. Whether the relative position of the Negro has actually been worsened remains to be seen when further statistics are available.

Even if the Negro's job position is essentially unchanged as a result of the long boom—an unemployment rate a bit more than twice the white rate—this presents some serious policy questions. If an unprecedented boom will not narrow the gap, what will?

EMPLOYMENT

FACTS ABOUT TITLE VII

OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964

EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY COMMISSION

EEOC

EEOC EQUAL EMPLOYMENT

HISTORY AND PURPOSE

The first official Federal action against discrimination in private employment was taken in 1941, when President Franklin D. Roosevelt issued the first order requiring that nondiscrimination clauses be inserted in government contracts.

Every subsequent President has adopted the same policy.

In 1945 New York adopted the first State fair employment practices law. By 1966, 56 cities, 35 states and the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands had such laws.

On July 2, 1964, Congress passed the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Title VII of the Act, "Equal Employment Opportunity," prohibits discrimination in hiring, upgrading and all other conditions of employment. It became effective on July 2, 1965.

Title VII established the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission composed of five members appointed by the President and approved by the Senate. The Commission's responsibility is to assure that all Americans will be considered for hiring and promotion on the basis of their ability and qualifications, without regard to race, color, religion, sex or national origin.

COVERAGE

Under Title VII the Commission is concerned with discrimination by four major groups—employers, public and private employment agencies, labor organizations and joint labor-management apprenticeship programs.

Title VII applies to employers of 75 or more persons, labor unions with 75 or more members or which operate hiring halls, and employment agencies dealing with employers of 75 or more persons. On July 2, 1967, it will apply to those with 50 or more, and on July 2, 1968, to those with 25 or more.

TITLE VII MAKES IT UNLAWFUL:

For any employer to discriminate in:

hiring or firing;

wages, terms, conditions or privileges of employment;

classifying, assigning or promoting employees or extending or assigning use of facilities;

training, retraining or apprenticeships

For any employer or employment agency to:

print, publish, circulate or cause the printing, publishing, circulation of advertisements or any other statement or announcement relating to employment expressing any specifications, limitations or preferences based on race, color, religion, sex, or national origin;

discriminate in receiving applications or classifying or referring for employment

For any labor organization to:

exclude or expel from membership; discriminate against any individual; limit, segregate or classify membership, refer to or fail to refer for employment on the basis of race, color, religion, sex or national origin;

cause or attempt to cause an employer to discriminate

For any employer, employment agency or labor organization to:

discriminate against any person because he has opposed any unlawful employment practices or because he has made charges, testified or participated in any action under Title VII.

Title VII Exemptions

Among those NOT covered, are local, state and federal agencies, government-owned corporations, Indian tribes and educational institutions where the employee performs work connected with the institution's educational activities.

HOW COMMISSION WORKS

The Commission has two basic responsibilities. First, it investigates complaints of discrimination, and if it finds they are justified, seeks a full remedy by the process of conciliation. Second, it promotes programs of voluntary compliance by employers, unions and community organizations to put the idea of equal employment opportunity into actual operation.

HOW TO FILE A COMPLAINT

If a person believes that he or she is a victim of discrimination by an employer, labor organization, employment agency or joint labor-management program for apprenticeship or training, that person may file a complaint with the Commission.

Instructions and complaint forms are available at the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, 1800 G Street, N.W., Washington, D. C., 20506, at local or state Fair Employment Practice agencies, or at the regional Equal Employment Opportunity Commission offices.

The following directions are taken from the official charge form:

...IT IS IMPORTANT TO FILE YOUR CHARGE AS SOON AS POSSIBLE AFTER THE DISCRIMINATION TOOK PLACE. To be sure your rights are protected, you should file no later than 90 days after the incident complained of. If you file later than that, the Commission may not be able to assist you.

...When the Commission receives the charge, a representative will review the facts and contact you either by mail or in person.

...If your charge is one which can be handled by the Commission, an investigator will gather all the facts in the situation from you and from the parties you have charged with discrimination.

...A COPY OF YOUR CHARGE WILL BE GIVEN TO THE PARTIES YOU HAVE CHARGED WITH DISCRIMINATION. THIS IS REQUIRED BY LAW.

...If the Commission does not find that the facts support your charge, you will be notified that the charge has been dismissed. The parties you have charged with discrimination will also be notified.

...If the Commission finds reasonable cause to believe that you have been discriminated against, it will attempt to conciliate and reach an agreement satisfactory to you and the company (or union, employment agency or apprenticeship committee).

...If it fails to reach such an agreement within a specified period of time, you have the right to take your complaint to court.

...If you live in a state which has a fair employment practice law, the Commission may be required to turn your case over to the state or local agency. You will be notified if this is done and you will be informed of your right to file the charge with our Commission at a later date, if you wish to do so.

OTHER AVENUES

Individual Commissioners may initiate complaints if they receive information which indicates that the law has been violated. In certain cases, where the Commission feels that a pattern or practice of discrimination exists rather than a single instance, the Justice Department will be advised and the Attorney General may then undertake action in the U. S. District Court.

STATE AGENCIES

Title VII provides that the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission defer investigation of a case arising in a state with an enforceable fair employment practice law for a period of not less than 60 days and, in the case of a newly-established state Fair Employment Practice organization, for a period of not more than 120 days. The Commission has determined that it will defer to the following states:

Alaska	Kansas	New Mexico
California	Kentucky	New York
Colorado	Maryland	Ohio
Connecticut	Massachusetts	Oregon
Delaware	Michigan	Pennsylvania
District of Columbia	Minnesota	Puerto Rico
	Missouri	Rhode Island
Hawaii	Nebraska	Utah
Illinois	Nevada	Washington
Indiana	New Hampshire	Wisconsin
Iowa	New Jersey	Wyoming

On cases involving sex discrimination, the Commission defers to the following:

District of Columbia	Massachusetts	New York
	Missouri	Utah
Hawaii	Nebraska	Wisconsin
Maryland		Wyoming

The Commission does not defer to: Idaho, Maine, Montana and Vermont. These states provide criminal sanctions for discrimination but do not establish or authorize a state agency to administer the statute.

The Commission does not defer to: Arizona (first offense only), Oklahoma, Tennessee and West Virginia. These outlaw discrimination or declare it contrary to state policy, but provide for voluntary compliance only.

RELATED FEDERAL AGENCIES

Other federal agencies have authority to assure equal employment opportunity.

- National Labor Relations Board can prohibit certain discriminatory practices by labor unions.
- Office of Federal Contract Compliance, Department of Labor, administers the President's Executive Order which prohibits employment discrimination by all government contractors and subcontractors working on contracts and federally assisted construction which exceed $10,000 or contracts or purchase orders for standard commercial supplies which exceed $100,000.
- Federally Assisted Programs—Title VI of the Civil Rights Act forbids discrimination in employment in federally assisted programs or activities.
- U. S. Civil Service Commission is required to supervise and provide leadership and guidance in the conduct of equal employment programs for federal employees and applicants for employment within the executive departments and agencies.

AFFIRMATIVE ACTION

Title VII contemplates and encourages voluntary compliance by employers, unions and employment agencies through affirmative action programs.

Such programs are designed to help business, union and community leadership achieve the goals of equal employment opportunity through aggressive recruiting, job training and job upgrading.

The Commission offers guidance in the development of these programs through its technical assistance specialists.

Guidance is provided in open recruiting, in creating a climate for integrated work forces, in obtaining federal funds for training projects and in intergroup employee relations.

REQUIREMENTS OF THE LAW

REPORTS

Employers covered by Title VII must make an annual report concerning the racial, ethnic and sex composition of its work force and the types of jobs held. This report is Standard Form 100, Equal Employment Opportunity Employer Information Report EEO-1.

POSTER

Employers are required to post in a conspicuous place a notice setting forth summaries of the law and information about the filing of complaints.

Dear Al:

Many thanks for your January 20 note; we have mailed 1,000 of the tabloids and 50 of the Encampment (19 through 23 year-olds) applications and 50 (15 through 18 year-olds) of the Center applications.

As an encouragement to potential applicants to the Southern Appalachian Center for Education in Democracy, we would like to offer 12 half scholarships ($225. each) to be awarded to applicants the Southern Regional Council recommends. These and other applicants can be assured that they can request further assistance if it can be justified on the basis of economic need. We would hope that they would also investigate possible local sources of partial sponsorship, however. If we can enlarge this offer after the Field Foundation and other foundation Boards have met, I'll be in touch with you post haste. By all means, assure potential applicants that they may apply for full scholarships in any of the four projects.

Do let me know if we can provide further materials or information. I will let you know as soon as we have a director for the Kentucky project and will seek your advice about a time for a one day meeting to plan the additional program.

Best regards,

Cordially,

Douglas Kelley
Executive Director

Four exciting six-week projects dealing with the unfinished business of American democracy will be sponsored by the Encampment for Citizenship during the summer of 1966.

Two new Encampment locations have been added: Washington, D.C., and a new site in rural Kentucky. Projects are also slated for New York City, where Encampments have been held each summer since 1946, and Puerto Rico, which has hosted an Encampment each summer since 1961.

The Washington, D. C., and Puerto Rico Encampments will enroll men and women aged 19 through 23. Two "Centers for Education in Democracy" for high school-age youth (15 through 18) will be held on the 15-acre campus of the Fieldston School, New York City, and at a site soon to be announced in Kentucky, in the midst of anti-poverty activity.

Civil rights, the whole range of anti-poverty efforts, and world affairs will be given top priority in the educational programs of the Washington, New York and Kentucky projects. "Democracy and social-economic development in the Western Hemisphere" will be the focus of the Puerto Rico Encampment's educational program. The Puerto Rico Encampment is for campers from throughout the Hemisphere.

As in the past, campers will represent a cross section of the nation, of many racial, religious, ethnic and economic backgrounds. Also in the Encampment tradition will be the educational approach: no partisan or sectarian ax to grind, emphasis on discussions and see-for-yourself fieldtrips, and insistence that even the most distinguished speakers take time, after their lectures, for questions and thorough discussion.

DIVERSITY THE KEY

Speakers will represent many points of view, and will include members of Congress and other political leaders, officials in the federal Administration, the Government of Puerto Rico and local governments. Outstanding and controversial social scientists, social workers, journalists, and spokesmen for business, labor and farm groups will

Congressman John V. Lindsay, Mayor-Elect of New York City:

"The Encampment for Citizenship . . . has established in the hearts and minds of thousands of young people enduring adherence to fundamental democratic principles.

"The Encampments have done much to build citizens, not only of this country, but of other countries of the world, and this achievement cannot be underestimated. They have been a distillation of democracy, and their work in carrying the cause of freedom to the young will gain increasing numbers of friends as time passes."

Encampment Impact Hits Record Number In '65

A record number of 261 campers took part in the Encampment for Citizenship's three Summer '65 projects, in New York City, Puerto Rico and Berkeley, California. Their enthusiastic letters to the projects' directors, this fall, testify once again to the educational and emotional impact of the Encampment experience.

Allard Lowenstein, lawyer-teacher-author (Brutal Mandate — the story of South West Africa) and alumnus of the 1947 Encampment, was director of the New York Encampment, held for the 20th year at the Fieldston School, Riverdale. The 110 campers, highly diverse in racial, religious, ethnic and economic backgrounds, represented a broad spectrum of political beliefs. Stimulating sessions with guest lecturers, intense, often marathon-length staff and camper discussions, and frequent fieldtrips to points throughout the New York area added up to a dynamic confrontation with the country's major public affairs issues.

Guest lecturers, who dealt with civil rights, foreign policy, and economic and social problems (examples: law in American slums; problems of the press; narcotics; innovation in higher education) were a distinguished lot. Congressmen and other spokesmen for the Democratic and Republican parties were included, along with Yale, Princeton and Harvard faculty members, the President of Antioch College, representatives of the Civil Rights Commission and the State Department, and spokesmen for civil rights organizations, the labor movement, and left and right-wing dissent groups.

The gubernatorial candidate of the Freedom Democratic Party of Mississippi was a speaker, as were two candidates for Mayor of New York City, the editors of the Lexington (Mississippi) Advertiser and the New York Post, Norman Thomas, UN Mediator Dr. Frank Graham and American Civil Liberties Union founder Roger Baldwin.

Workshops at the New York Encampment dealt with foreign policy, law and the poor, political and community organization, urban social problems, education, cultural affairs, and the New York City power structure. Another workshop enabled campers to take part in a tutorial project for disadvantaged youngsters, run by student volunteers on Harlem's West Side.

Workshop groups made frequent fieldtrips to the UN and various foreign missions to the UN, to the offices of a wide range of social agencies and community organizations, to the police and courts, treatment centers for drug addicts, Broadway and off-Broadway stage personalities and productions, bank, newspaper and trade union offices and television news studios.

Regional Action Groups Will Be Co-Sponsors

The Encampment's 1966 projects in Eastern Kentucky and in Puerto Rico will be co-sponsored by locally-based community action organizations.

The Encampment's high-school-age Center for Education in Democracy, in Eastern Kentucky, will be co-sponsored by the Council of the Southern Mountains and by the Southern Regional Council. The Council of the Southern Mountains, with headquarters at Berea, Kentucky, assists the work of hundreds of local agencies and individuals leading the anti-poverty struggle in Southern Appalachia. The Southern Regional Council, at Atlanta, aids and coordinates the work of local organizations throughout the South working toward equal rights and opportunities for all.

In Puerto Rico the Encampment for Citizenship will be co-sponsored by the Y.M.C.A. Cuerpo de Paz de Puerto Rico, a non-sectarian domestic Peace Corps supported by the federal anti-poverty program.

All three co-sponsoring organizations will assist the Encampment's staff in planning fieldtrips and community service work, and in locating outstanding guest lecturers, staff and campers.

Joe Prewitt, University of Puerto Rico graduate and alumnus of the 1964 Puerto Rico Encampment for Citizenship, discusses a village youth program with a Puerto Rican family. After a year's service as a volunteer in the YMCA Peace Corps of Puerto Rico, Joe is now on the staff of that non-sectarian anti-poverty agency. He and his co-workers will help campers at the 1966 Encampment for Citizenship get first-hand community development experience in communities throughout the island.

OGRAMS DEALING WITH OF AMERICAN DEMOCRACY

TWO CENTERS FOR EDUCATION IN DEMOCRACY, FOR THOSE 15 THROUGH 18 YEARS OF AGE:

NEW YORK CITY: "Urbanism and American Democracy." The educational program will be concerned with efforts to achieve better housing, health and education, honest government and public safety in a great urban area; urban aspects of anti-poverty and civil rights programs; history of democracy; community organization; the United Nations and other aspects of world affairs. Visits to ethnic areas, improvement programs and economic and cultural institutions throughout New York City, to City Hall and to the U.N. Opportunity for part-time community service in Harlem. Site: the 15-acre campus of the Fieldston School, Riverdale, Bronx; July 3—August 13. Cost: $450 (scholarship aid available on basis of need).

EASTERN KENTUCKY: "The Rural South and American Democracy." Educational program concerned with efforts to bring the nation's major underdeveloped area closer to national standards in employment, education, housing and health; rural aspects of the anti-poverty program; civil rights in Southern and border states; history of democracy; community organization; world affairs, particularly problems of developing nations. Visits to improvement programs in rural areas of Kentucky and Tennessee, and to Tennessee Valley Authority installations. Opportunity for part-time community service in a Kentucky community, and opportunities to learn folk dances and songs of the area. July 3—August 13. Cost: $450 (scholarship aid available on basis of need).

Campers at the 1965 New York Encampment for Citizenship discuss alternative strategies in the struggle for equality and civil rights. Young leaders of civil rights groups in all parts of the United States were among the campers.

"I was born in East Harlem. I had never been out of Harlem—I thought Harlem was the world. I thought only Harlem had problems.

"Taking part in the Center for Education in Democracy for six weeks opened my eyes. During those six weeks I got well acquainted with people from every kind of background, from all over the country. It really hurt, at the end, to have to say goodbye to people I hadn't wanted to shake hands with, when I got there.

Politics Workshop members at the 1965 New York Encampment for Citizenship study campaign plans and materials at a John V. Lindsay neighborhood headquarters. After an afternoon there, they visited with the new Mayor-Elect at his home. Two other candidates for Mayor of New York City were among speakers at the Encampment, and other candidates' headquarters were also visited.

Folk music always ranks high among recreational activities at Encampment projects. Dancing, swimming, volleyball, softball and other sports, as well as attendance at local cultural events, will be free-time activities at all Summer '66 projects.

Encampment Projects Are Not Only For Students

"Active interest in public affairs, not merely educational status, is the factor we're most concerned with," says Mrs. Clara Kobrak, chairman of the Encampment's Admissions Committee.

"No one should be discouraged from applying for admission to one of the Encampment's 19 to 23-year-old projects because he's not in college. We're just as interested in the applicant who's active in his local union, or farm youth group, or in anti-poverty or civil rights work, for example, as we are in students."

Mrs. Kobrak also pointed out that the 15 to 18-year-old projects are not limited to high school students.

APPLICATIONS FOR THE ENCAMPMENT'S SUMMER '66 PROJECTS ARE AVAILABLE FROM THE ENCAMPMENT FOR CITIZENSHIP, INC., 2 WEST 64TH STREET, NEW YORK CITY 10023. Use the form on page four.

"I learned something at the Center for Education in Democracy that will stay with me for the rest of my life. I learned to live with others, with people whose experiences and ideas are different.

"In the Social Problems workshop I became interested in mental retardation . . . . A visit to a migrant farm labor center was unforgettable . . . . I realize, now, what an apathetic community I live in—how important it is for me to care, and not just to leave it to the other fellow."

BERKELEY CENTER

Seventy-seven teen-agers from twenty states and Jamaica brought to life the Encampment's second annual "Center for Education in Democracy," at Berkeley, California. Their director, a staff veteran of the 1964 Center, was William T. Rogers, former New York City high school teacher, now Leader of the Ethical Society of Essex County, New Jersey.

Camper questions continued at a rapid rate throughout fieldtrips to a huge automated Standard Oil refinery, the Synanon treatment center for drug victims, migrant farm labor camps, a longshoremen's union hall and a Swedish merchant ship, ethnic areas and other points of interest in San Francisco, and several of the beaches, forests and other natural beauty spots of California.

Democratic and Republican speakers, a debate of Vietnam issues by University of California faculty members, lectures by spokesmen for the labor and cooperative movements, social agencies, civil rights groups and the Civil Liberties Union, a "rumor clinic," a selection of outstanding films—all these contributed to a stimulating program, a summer which many campers have written was the high point of their lives.

Two campers who had personally helped integrate the school at Americus, Georgia, made a unique contribution to the campers' understanding of race relations in the South. A closing week finale was a moving camper dramatic production of Martin Duberman's In White America.

ABOUT THE 1966 PROGRAM OF THE ENCAMPMENT FOR CITIZENSHIP

This year, for the first time, the Encampment for Citizenship is planning four projects:

1) The first Washington, D.C. Encampment will be held at the University of Maryland (8 miles from downtown Washington), June 19-July 30, for 100 19 through 23-year-olds. The theme: American Politics in a Revolutionary World. The director: Dr. Albert McQueen, 38, an alumnus of the 1949 Encampment who teaches sociology at Brooklyn College. Dr. McQueen taught at the University of Michigan and at Howard University before joining the staff at Brooklyn. He held a Ford Foundation African Studies Fellowship in Nigeria, 1961-'63.

2) The first Encampment project to be held in a southern or border state will be the Southern Appalachian Center for Education in Democracy, for 75 15 through 18-year-olds, to be held at Union College, Barbourville, Kentucky, July 3-August 13. The Center will be co-sponsored by Southern Regional Council (Atlanta) and the Council of the Southern Mountains (Berea, Ky.); it will also have the full cooperation of the Knox County Economic Opportunity Council, which, with 8 rural community centers and a staff of 125, is carrying on the anti-poverty battle in the area surrounding Barbourville. The theme: Appalachia, the Rural South, and American Democracy. The director will soon be announced.

3) An inter-American Encampment for Citizenship will be held in Puerto Rico for the sixth year, with the aid of the Puerto Rican government, June 26-August 6. This year a new and much improved site will be used, at Cayey, some 35 miles south of San Juan, in the mountains. The 100 19 through 23-year-old campers will include Latin Americans, Puerto Ricans living in Puerto Rico and in New York City, and North Americans of varied backgrounds. The "YMCA Peace Corps of Puerto Rico," an anti-poverty program of young volunteers, will co-sponsor this Encampment. The theme: Democracy and Social-Economic Development in the Western Hemisphere. The director: Mr. John Dombrowski, 29, a Latin American affairs specialist at American University. Mr. Dombrowski specialized in Latin American politics and government at the Pennsylvania State University and American University, did volunteer community development work in Ecuador, directed peasant leader training courses in Peru for the International Development Foundation, and now does research and writing on Latin American affairs for American University. He speaks Spanish and Portuguese.

4) For the 21st year, an Encampment project will be held on the 15-acre campus of the Fieldston School, on the edge of New York City. This year it will be a Center for Education in Democracy, for 75 15 through 18-year-olds. The theme: Urbanism and American Democracy. The director: Mr. William T. Rogers, Jr., 45,

NON-PROFIT, NON-SECTARIAN, NON-PARTISAN; FOUNDED IN 1946 BY ALGERNON D. BLACK AND THE AMERICAN ETHICAL UNION.

"The Encampment for Citizenship has been an effective pioneering project in citizenship education. It has helped train people for all walks of American life. Our government, and now the Peace Corps, have reaped the harvest of its work. . . ." —John F. Kennedy

"This venture with which the name of Eleanor Roosevelt has been so closely associated has made a splendid contribution in citizenship education and in the training of young people." —Lyndon B. Johnson who directed the Encampment's teen-age Center at Berkeley, California, in 1965. A graduate of Wilberforce University and the University of Connecticut, Mr. Rogers is Leader of the Essex County (N.J.) Ethical Society, and was formerly a New York City high school teacher.

All four Encampment projects will make it possible for their participants to take part in part-time community service work, related to the anti-poverty program, one day each week and one full week of the six. The volunteer work will be an integral part of the educational program, under the direction of staff leaders of workshops on specialized topics.

The Encampment's projects fill a need which none of the other summer study and service programs serve in quite the same way. Its projects are primarily study and discussion programs rather than workcamps. They are non-partisan and non-sectarian, and not designed to lead participants to any pre-established set of conclusions -- beyond recognition of the urgent importance of active, informed participation in the democratic process. Because of the diversity of racial, religious, ethnic and economic backgrounds represented in a living-together situation usually involving a highly developed sense of community, Encampment projects result in far greater educational impact upon participants than do ordinary "summer school" programs. At the conclusion of a Foundation-supported intensive evaluation of the Encampment's effectiveness, Columbia University's Bureau of Applied Social Research called the Encampment "a rare and successful experiment in democratic education." *

The Encampment's high school-age Centers for Education in Democracy, in particular, are unique. There are very few other opportunities for even the best-qualified high school students to spend a summer gaining a better understanding of democracy and of unfamiliar peoples and problems, taking part in related community service work, and sharpening their leadership skills. Thus the Encampment's Board and staff hope gradually to increase the number of high school-age Centers for Education in Democracy, as financial support can be secured. The Southern Appalachian and New York City Centers for Education in Democracy, this summer, are the first step in this direction -- previously, in 1964 and '65, only one Center program was held, at Berkeley, California.

The Encampment for Citizenship welcomes support from individuals, business firms and foundations able to help it to continue and expand its work. Further details concerning the 1965 and 1966 projects of the Encampment for Citizenship are given in the tabloid newspaper, SUMMER PROJECTS '66. The Encampment's Executive Director will gladly provide more detailed information in response to particular questions.

Direction, Salience, and Intensity of the Effects of an Intergroup Education Experience:

Attitude and Behavior Changes Attributable to the Encampment for Citizenship

by

SAAL D. LESSER and CHARLES WINICK

WHAT IS THE direction, salience, and stability of the effects of an intergroup education experience? This question has been of continuing concern to students of intercultural relations for decades. Some parameters of an answer emerge in a five year appraisal of the attitudinal effects on young people of participation in the Encampment for Citizenship.* The appraisal was conducted by the Bureau of Applied Social Research of Columbia University. This is an analysis of some highlights of the Bureau's report, the details of which are soon to be published in full.[1]

The study's central conclusion is that the Encampment for Citizenship program creates a positive change in intergroup attitudes and values which persists in effect over a period of years. In its approach to the problem of evaluation, the study represents a thorough compendium of modern methods for measuring attitude change in one of the most systematic overviews of attitude measurement since the publication of the work of the Information and Education Division of the U.S. Army in World War II.[2]

* The Encampment for Citizenship is a nonsectarian, non-political educational organization founded in 1946 by Algernon D. Black and inaugurated under the auspices of the American Ethical Union. A book on the history and educational program of the Encampment for Citizenship entitled The Young Citizens, written by Algernon D. Black, will be published sometime in 1961.

Saal D. Lesser is Executive Director, Encampment for Citizenship. Charles Winick is a teacher, lecturer and writer (author of, among others, Trends in Human Relations Research, 1955).

In 1955 the Encampment for Citizenship, with assistance from the Emil Schwarzhaupt Foundation, requested the Bureau of Applied Social Research of Columbia University to conduct an exhaustive evaluation of the Encampment program. Additional assistance later came from the Ford Foundation and the Columbia University Council for Research in the Social Sciences.

Since its inception in 1946, the Encampment has been educating young Americans and some foreign students in the 18 to 23 age range to a deeper appreciation and knowledge of the democratic process. Participants are encouraged to find ways of translating their six weeks summer experience into a meaningful program of action upon returning to their home communities. Thus, students from farm, labor, Indian reservations, community organizations, and a wide range of socio-economic class backgrounds, find a training laboratory for citizen participation in the Encampment. Its participants come from widely varied racial, religious and ethnic backgrounds, thus providing a unique context for the learning experience of the participants.

STUDY DESIGN

The purpose of this study was to measure and evaluate the ways in which the generalized goals of the Encampment were actually being achieved. The participants who came to the Encampment in 1955, 1957 and 1958 were studied.

The campers were evaluated before and after exposure to the Encampment program on the basis of their execution of a number of specially designed questionnaires. Account was taken of factors like the effect of non-Encampment activities, the natural development of the campers during the six weeks period of the Encampment, possible instability in the measuring instruments and the effect of the measurement process itself. Quaker work-campers studied by Henry Riecken provided a control group which permitted comparison of change due to the Encampment with the change due to the related experience of a work-camp.[3]

The employment of appropriate correction factors established that the sheer passage of six weeks, the sheer process of growth, the sheer responsiveness to the larger world could not have produced the changes apart from the Encampment experience itself.

The initial measurement of the campers took place six weeks prior to their arrival at the Encampment. The second set of measures for control purposes was taken on the first day of the Encampment. This provided a measure of the changes in the campers themselves as the result of the passage of a period of time comparable to that of the Encampment. They were then measured at the conclusion of the Encampment and six weeks later, at their homes. The changes in a control group which was untreated and the changes observed for three other cycles of the program provided additional comparative control data.

In addition to questionnaire data, time sampling was used to make field observations at the Encampment itself. The regular appearance of the observers relieved the participants of any sense that their activities were under scrutiny. One third of the total Encampment period was observed, and this observation provided behavioral and other non-quantifiable data.

THE CAMPERS

The young people participating in the Encampment represent a cross section of the nation. Though heterogeneous in background, they are relatively homogeneous in their motivation and interest in social problems. Their age range is between 18 and 23, although the majority of campers tested were between 18 and 20. Women were a majority but never constituted more than 65 per cent of the group. The 1955 group included 75 white campers, 30 Negroes, and 13 American Indians. The three major religions were among those represented.

No special ideological or attitudinal criteria for selection are employed by the Encampment. A questionnaire administered by the research team on the first day of camp established that altruism and humanitarianism were important values to the campers. More private values were also important; some campers planned for "service" oriented careers while others hoped for more private occupations.

A number of questions from Stouffer's 1954 national survey of attitudes toward deviant beliefs and behavior, along with other questions, were incorporated in the questionnaire given campers upon arrival.[4] Comparison of responses to this questionnaire established that the recruits were unusually democratic and non-authoritarian in their attitudes. Campers saw themselves as being more liberal than the average American on such issues as civil liberties, economic planning and race relations.

ENCAMPMENT EXPERIENCE

The 1955 Encampment, which was the one most intensively studied, was held on the campus of the Fieldston School in Riverdale, New York.

Because of its proximity to urban centers, the Encampment had easy access to a great variety of resource persons and institutions. Academic material could become more alive and meaningful. Staff lectures were supplemented by guest speakers who brought concrete information and viewpoints directly from the very areas of life in which the problems under discussion occurred.

The core experience in each unit of study was the discussion group. Campers met in small groups under a faculty leader to discuss and interpret the material. Learning was related to the campers' individual backgrounds.

Field trips for research were planned to assure first-hand observation of problems. Direct contact in the community was made both with people and leadership elements in the population. Campers saw conditions in different social and economic areas of the community, visited housing developments, talked with families and met with school, church and civic leaders. Trips included visits to neighborhood settlements, human relations agencies, labor union headquarters, large corporations, governmental and private agencies, migrant farm labor camps and steel plants.

The campers were encouraged to select a problem of immediate interest and concern. Then, either individually or in small groups, they spent time on research, reading and reporting. Typical workshops explored such problems as: segregation and integration, farm surplus, labor and management relations, juvenile delinquency, international relations, mediation of strikes, political action, civil liberties, community relations, migrant labor, housing, sit-ins, church-state relations, and American Indian tribal problems.

Special case studies and findings of projects conducted by workshop groups were reported to the entire Encampment. In many instances, they were reported in panel and sociodrama form. Campers learned techniques, solved problems and discovered new methods of presenting their findings effectively.

Talents of campers were utilized in programming recreational and social activities. The cultural riches of the urban centers — theaters, concerts, museums — were drawn upon to a considerable extent.

MEASURED CHANGES CREATED BY THE ENCAMPMENT

Detailed objective measurements were made of six areas: 1) social attitudes, 2) basic values, 3) action orientation, 4) cognition of social problems, 5) self perceptions vis-a-vis society, and 6) conduct. The measurements were made at the beginning and end of the Encampment, and the differences between the two periods compared.

Even though the campers were relatively tolerant before the experience, their attitudes became significantly more tolerant. There was a small decrease in authoritarianism. Their fairly well established proclivities for social action were somewhat strengthened although there was a shift of their previous orientation away from international affairs and toward the solution of national problems.

The greatest change in cognition of social problems came in the area of race prejudice. The campers had become quite optimistic about the amelioration of prejudice by the end of the summer. The campers' self perception vis-a-vis society did not change, either in terms of alienation between campers and the rest of society or in terms of their taking a harsher view of the average American. The campers manifested a high degree of democracy in their selection of friends without regard to ethnicity. The campers

- became more appreciative of our traditional civil liberties.
- became more tolerant of freedom for non-conformists.
- became stronger in defense of civil rights for minorities.
- became more optimistic about solving pressing social problems.
- felt less sense of social isolation.
- showed a small increase in tendency toward political action through accepted social channels.
- implemented the philosophy of the dignity of man in the friendships they formed during the summer, irrespective of race.

The campers did NOT

- become unrealistic in views as to the ease of solving problems.
- become more provincial in their conceptions of a democratic society.
- become prejudiced in reverse. Friendships were formed proportionately toward whites and Negroes.
- become more "radical" in their political ideology.
- become alienated from the common man, nor harshened in their view of the "average American," nor show any increased tendency to see Americans as unbound by moral imperatives.

Their own evaluation of the experience was that they had generally become more aware of and sensitized to social problems.

Although the six weeks' experience at the Encampment led to considerable and measurable change, measurement of the change in a control group of a third of the campers six weeks before the Encampment as compared with their responses when they began the Encampment yielded a negligible change. This control measure was undertaken in order to measure the modification occurring as a result of the passage of time. Thus, it can be said that the change resulting from the Encampment was not the result of the mere passage of time. That this change was not a reflection of any special qualities of the sample of 1955 campers was established by similar studies conducted of 1957 and 1958 campers, who also manifested significant changes in a replication of the 1955 procedure.

DYNAMICS OF CHANGE

One focus of study was the manner in which the changes which did occur took place. An attempt was made to determine the relative weight of the didactic and the communal parts of the program. Several special analyses demonstrated that the formal educational elements do not, in and of themselves, completely account for the program's success. Some data suggests that the informal communal life is at least as important in effecting change as is the didactic program. Minority racial status was no barrier to change during the Encampment.

THE RETURN HOME

The campers returned to a variety of settings. Many had become sensitized to a variety of social problems, especially race prejudice, in their home communities. For some campers, their Encampment participation had led them to feel they had "outgrown" their home towns. Some campers took socially constructive action in their communities.

The campers generally maintained a high rate of interaction with each other, by mail or personal contact and other means. The majority of the campers reported no change in their family relationships when they returned home. Almost half the campers reported that their relationships with pre-Encampment friends had changed.

Some 37 per cent of the campers who wanted to apply some clear Encampment-based principle in their communities were able to do so. Even when campers met a situation which was hostile to the ideals of the Encampment, they were seldom shaken in their views. Some 88 per cent of the campers had engaged in discussions about public issues in their home communities.

STABILITY OF EFFECTS

One of the effects of the Encampment experience was that after six weeks at home, the campers manifested some feelings of alienation. Most of the gains, however, which had been made in the course of the Encampment did persist. There appeared to be some differentiation of stability of effects:

- To a considerable extent, there was a tendency for the Indian campers to lose the gains they had made upon return to the home setting.
- The gains of the Negro campers remained fairly stable.
- Southern campers showed little difference from those in other parts of the country in stability of Encampment effects, except in the two areas of optimism about race prejudice and implementation of Encampment lessons.

EFFECTS IN THE COLLEGE SETTING

Comparison of a control group of college students with Encampment participants who were college students suggests that the two groups had roughly comparable attitudes. Comparisons which were made between the campus activities of the campers and of the control group in tolerance and in actual participation in college life showed that the Encampment had a definite but not very large effect. The Encampment did not appear to have an impact on the students' academic life or on their impression of the value of a college education.

LONG-RANGE EFFECTS

In 1959, questionnaires designed to measure long-range effects were sent to the 100 ex-campers who formed the core group for whom data had been collected both at the beginning and end of the Encampment in 1955. Of this group, 73 returned the questionnaires.

For about a third of the group, the Encampment still remains a salient experience. Friendships with other campers were still maintained, in many cases. Over the four year period since the Encampment, there was only a slight loss from the earlier gains the camper had made in liberalism and tolerance.

Campers often applied Encampment principles to their daily lives, over the four year period since 1955. They were fairly active politically. The campers for whom the Encampment reference group was a meaningful one were more likely to engage in social action than the group which made less use of the reference group, although the stability of opinions and attitude change of both groups were fairly similar.

The Bureau of Applied Social Research, in order to determine further long-range effects of the Encampment experience also studied a sampling of the alumni of 1946. It was found that the alumni of past Encampments, though removed from its influence for some years, generally show a parallel profile of attitudes. Therefore, despite a passage of some time, even the alumni furthest removed show no marked lessening of sentiments on behalf of tolerance and civil liberties.

It can be concluded that the Encampment for Citizenship is extremely effective in both creating and increasing positive attitudinal and value changes in most of its participants. The carryover into later life through the persistence of these effects gives assurance that the Encampment program is highly meaningful and provides a depth and scope that is unique in citizenship education. The Encampment experience, writ large, has increasing relevance to the shape of an America of the future in which accessibility to both the quality and quantity of experience will be improved for all.

The Encampment for Citizenship welcomes applications from young people 18 to 23 years of age who are interested in becoming better informed citizens and who are concerned with working to implement democratic principles and practices. Scholarships are available for those who are in economic need. For application forms and further information write:

AN ADDRESS TO THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE EPISCOPAL SOCIETY FOR CULTURAL AND RACIAL UNITY JACKSON, MISS., SEPT. 10, 1965

BY

CHARLES F. WITTENSTEIN, SOUTHEAST AREA DIRECTOR
THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE

The Civil Rights Movement and the Ecumenical Movement are not new. Our generation cannot claim to have conceived them. We have been building on the foundations constructed by thoughtful and inspired men of other times. It is only when we see the magnitude of the job which remains to be done, that we are inclined to wonder whether any effort has been put forth before.

How is it that the ancient ideas embodied in the Civil Rights and Ecumenical Movements have suddenly become so important to so many? Why, in the Sixties, should these matters be so much more urgent than they seemed earlier? And why is it that these two movements have accelerated simultaneously?

A part of the answer to these questions lies in our fortunate choice of enemies during the Second World War. We found ourselves at war not only with Germany but also with Hitler's concept of the Master Race. So we set out to defeat Germany, and at the same time to destroy the Aryan claim to superiority.

It was not until the world learned the truth about the gas chambers and the cremetoria, however, that the full horror of racism penetrated the public conscience. In "the final solution", the Nazis showed us the logical conclusion of racism. Once we understood that, the absolute necessity for reconciliation became obvious.

It requires only brief reflection, therefore, to appreciate that it is not by chance that these two movements have matured together, because inter-racial and inter-religious relations are inextricably intertwined.

Recognizing that is important, but it is becoming increasingly essential that we be able to identify the ways in which they relate to each other; and where the requirements of the movements diverge and converge.

It is fairly easy to see points of convergance. When the Civil Rights Act of 1964 forbids discrimination on grounds of race or religion, it tackles both problems in the same way; a way, I might add, that I consider entirely appropriate and long overdue.

It is also significant to note the Civil Rights issue has been a tremendously unifying force for the religiously oriented people of America. Diverse denominations have joined forces and worked together on this issue in an unprecedented fashion. Illustrative of this was the Chicago Conference on Religion and Race that formalized the coalition of Catholics, Protestants and Jews which subsequently helped pass the Civil Rights Act. That coalition was very much in evidence during the Selma to Montgomery March, and it recently assisted in the enactment of the new Voting Rights Bill. So the race issue has been valuable to the Church, not only for the opportunities it provided for internal renewal, but also because it has tended to promote a highly desirable rapprochement with other religious organizations. By now almost everyone concerned with improving interfaith relations recognizes that a Brotherhood Dinner is considerably less effective than a joint effort on behalf of a common cause.

Minority groups, whether racial or religious, share, or should share, a commitment toward cultural pluralism. When I speak of cultural pluralism, I refer to a social order which accepts it as appropriate that ethnic, religious, nationality, racial and other groups maintain their individual identities and separate institutions while making their unique contribution to a unified nation. Only in a society founded on this principle can minorities in this country hope to maintain their integrity and secure their vital interests. It is theoretically possible to have a homogeneous democracy, and perhaps that ideal has been achieved in Scandanavia, but if we are to have democracy in America, it must be rooted in cultural pluralism. This in turn is based on the simple notion that the other guy has a right to be different, and that difference does not imply inferiority or superiority.

In terms of official public policy, we have come close to accepting that notion on the National level. We will not have adopted it completely, however, until we have so reformed our immigration law that the national origin quota system is completely eliminated from it. (This reform was adopted in October of 1965.) This is the last important vestige of Aryan superiority on the books of the United States Government. It is a downright insult to all Americans who cannot trace their ancestry back to one of those Northern European nations most favored by big quotas.

Of course, on the unofficial level, we have much further to go. Our society is cluttered with exclusive institutions maintained to provide association only with people "like us". When you inquire about the bonds which hold members together in such institutions, about the criteria of congeniality, too often one finds nothing but requirements relating to ethnic origin, religion, race or money.

Don't dismiss this kind of snobbery as inconsequential. It lends status and respectability to bigotry, and provides a standard around which the social climbers and conformists, who are exceedingly numerous, will rally. It is a poison which seeps outward and downward through society polluting wherever it reaches.

This is one of the reasons I think your effort to eliminate segregation in the Church is so important to the moral well-being of the community as a whole. You don't do it for that purpose but it has that effect. You do what you must for internal reasons -- to insure the integrity of Christian doctrine -- but when you are successful in purifying the Church, you are also denying its blessing to criteria which are detrimental to civic life. I want to make it clear, however, that I don't consider racial segregation in a church, or religious discrimination in a country club the kind of issue in which government may properly intervene. From a legal standpoint, they have a right to be snobs and fools. One may have a right without being right.

Everyone knows what a struggle we are having in the South to achieve compliance with the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Brown versus Board of Education. By now it is clear that there are a large number of people, public officials included, who are psychologically in a state of secession. They have adopted a stance of defiance, and dared Washington to try to make school desegregation work. They don't think of "our" Supreme Court but of "their" Supreme Court, not of the "Federal" government but of the "Central" government.

What is little appreciated outside the South, however, is the widespread existence here of exactly the same kind of defiance regarding the Supreme Court decisions on Bible reading and recitations of the Lord's Prayer in the Murray and Schempp cases.

When most Northerners or Westerners think about the problem of Church-State separation, it is in terms of anxiety lest the Roman Catholics get their hands into the public till. That is not our problem in the South. Historically, the public schools in this region have been Protestant institutions to which Catholics and Jews were graciously admitted. In this White Anglo-Saxon Protestant culture, the educators have not been deliberately offensive to Catholics, Jews or humanists --- they never thought of taking them into account. Almost invariably, however, Southern Protestants are shocked by the observation that out public schools are permeated with a rather heavy Protestant orientation.

It is remarkable, too, how often you will find that the same people who defend religious practices in public education are most vociferous in proclaiming their devotion to strict separation of Church and State. They are the ones most outraged by Headstart classes in a Catholic church.

But inconsistency seems to be the rule rather than the exception in matters of this kind. It must be said that frequently the most blatant religious practices occur in the all-Negro public schools in the South, which are unblushingly Protestant. Consider the irony of that for a moment: defiance of the Supreme Court's edict on the First Amendment by the group with the largest stake in promoting compliance with the Supreme Court's edict on the Fourteenth Amendment.

I firmly believe that the South will have racial integration in its schools long before it accords equality to Jewish, Catholic and non-believing children. One Atlanta school had a unique solution to the problem of religion in public education: instead of holding services in the school auditorium at Christmas time, they marched the entire student body to a nearby Christian church. This won't happen again, however, because the school is now racially integrated while the nearby Christian church remains lily white.

As you may huve gathered, it is my conviction that affirmative legislation is essential to the achievement of racial equality. But it does not necessarily follow that the same strategy is appropriate to achieve religious parity in America. Indeed, this is the most important and least understood point of divergence between the drive for racial and religious equality.

There has been a widespread and generally accepted tendency in American life for religious groups to employ the machinery of the State -- when they have the power to do it -- in order to further sectarian purposes. Protestants and Catholics both engage in this practice.

We are familiar with Catholic efforts to write their own particular view of divorce, birth control and censorship into law. In doing so, they seek to extend the coverage of Catholic theology to non-Catholics with legal sanction. At the same time, what was voluntary adherence to Catholic dogma by Catholics themselves becomes compulsory.

Prohibition, of course, is an extension of Protestant theology backed up by the police power of government. And as I have pointed out, the Sunday School atmosphere of Southern public schools represents an effort to use state machinery for church purposes.

Whose ox is gored depends entirely upon who wields the greatest power in a particular community. In all of this, the Jews of America come out looking very good for the simple reason that we are always in the minority and never in the majority.

Very frankly, I resent what I consider to be an unwarranted intrusion into my private life by my neighbors' efforts to deprive me of a bourbon and soda after a tough day at the office. Many of you may share my irritation on this score, or perhaps you have an urge to buy a lottery ticket and strike it rich. There is no question about it: this sort of thing does create inter-group tension which is sometimes so bitter that it tears communities apart fully as much as racial conflict.

At the heart of the matter is coercion. Often the coercion is applied in areas which are intensely personal rather than public.

What doth cultural pluralism require of us? I suggest that it requires us to cease and desist from using the State to impose our sectarian viewpoint on others.

Richard Cardinal Cushing of Boston provided me with the text when he said,

> "It does not seem reasonable to me to forbid in civil law a practice that can be considered a matter of private morality. Catholics do not need the support of civil law to be faithful to their own religious convictions, and they do not seek to impose by law their moral views on other members of society."

This statement reflects the tremendous change which is taking place in American Roman Catholocism. It is a clear reflection of the Ecumenical spirit, and I commend it to all denominations.

In order to implement our goal of reconciliation among the churches and synagogues, what we must do is embark upon a program of repealing old laws, even while supporting new laws embodying our aspirations for racial justice.

Which are the old laws that are inconsistent with religious rapprochement? They include those already referred to, such as, the highly restrictive measures dealing with birth control, divorce, and prohibition. I would go further than this, however, and include a wide variety of statutes that fall under the general heading of Sunday Blue Laws. The only adults worth having in Church on Sunday are those who come of their own free will and accord. It would be a sad commentary on religion if attendance depended largely on State prohibitions against doing anything else on Sunday morning.

What about the Orthodox Jewish retailer and Seventh Day Adventist who closes on Saturday in obedience to Mosaic law? I sincerely hope it does not offend the Christian conscience to permit him to open on Sunday.

These laws should be repealed even though, in some instances, the Supreme Court has upheld their constitutionality. Certainly the State should regulate hours and working conditions, and perhaps it should insist that business stay closed one day a week. But it can safely leave the determination of the day to individual choice in order to insure the widest latitude for religious liberty.

The most troublesome part of my thesis is its implication for religious involvement in civil rights activity. Does my view of the requirements of cultural pluralism imply that the churches are wrong to seek legislation which embodies their moral position on human dignity? I think not.

When we enact a statute which prohibits murder we are legislating morality and requiring the entire society to abide by the commandment handed down at Mount Sinai. But no one thinks that this law should be repealed. It is distinguishable from the Sunday Blue Law, for example, by the universality of its acceptance, and by the very practical consideration that it is a sine qua non of civilization.

While there are many individuals who argue against racial integration from what they consider to be a religious viewpoint, there are no religions as such that I know of which deny the essential unity of mankind, nor any major faiths which hold, as a matter of theology, that one race should enjoy a favored position in society. Not only do Catholics, Protestants and Jews tend to agree on these matters, but most secular humanists are also with us on this. So we need not worry about imposing a narrow sectarian position because no sect or even any major religious group can claim exclusive possession of racial justice.

Racial justice, however, is only simple justice. It was, after all, a Southerner named Thomas Jefferson who once wrote, by way of declaring our independence from Great Britain, that governments are instituted among men "to secure these rights." And the Preamble to the United States Constitution affirms that we have formed this Union "to establish justice."

I anticipate that Ecumenism will maintain its forward thrust. I am convinced that its internal logic will require that we all voluntarily refrain from coercion in matters of conscience. By supporting repeal of public policies contrary to this principle, we shall be undertaking activity with enormous potential for enhancing group life in America. By supporting compliance with decisions affecting prayer and Bible reading we shall be improving the climate for compliance with decisions on race.

Racial Tinderbox

A Federal Study Finds Unrest Among Negroes Rising in Many Cities

New Watts-Type Rioting Is Feared; Vietnam's Inroads On Great Society a Factor

A Look at Oakland's Troubles

By MONROE W. KARMIN
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

WASHINGTON — "The more optimistic feel that we have a year in which to improve the climate; others believe the situation to be such that any incident can spark an explosion."

This ominous assessment is contained in a highly confidential report, compiled by Government agents, now being studied by Federal policy-makers. The climate referred to is an atmosphere of Negro unrest; the explosion feared is a riot similar to that which rocked the Watts area of Los Angeles last August; and the city in which this incendiary situation has been detected is, surprisingly, Oakland, Calif.

There, as in some better-known trouble spots, an influx of impoverished Negroes has put a strain on local housing, schools and job opportunities. Among Oakland's Negroes, the unemployment rate runs about five times the national average. A slum clearance project actually has reduced the supply of cheap housing. Negro relations with the police are unhappy. Not enough is being done, Negro spokesmen complain, to relieve the causes of tension.

The significance of the unpublicized Oakland survey extends beyond the element of surprise, beyond the fact that the city is not associated in the public mind with racial turmoil. It reaches to the heart of the "guns or butter" problem that finds President Johnson striving to scale down his costly Great Society plans, many of them designed to aid poor Negroes, so he can finance the Vietnam war.

"High Tension" Cities

Even as the President prunes, dissatisfied Negroes are complicating his chore by demanding more. What is true in Oakland is true in almost every major metropolis in the nation. Federal officials who have felt the pulse now possess a closely guarded list of "high tension" cities where it's said the threat of violence is raised by Negro resentment over lack of jobs, inadequate schools and housing, and the attitudes of police and local officeholders.

The list has lately grown to 21 cities, including Oakland. The others are Baltimore, Boston, Buffalo, Chicago, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Detroit, Gary, Houston, Los Angeles, Miami, Memphis, Newark, New Orleans, New York, Philadelphia, Rochester, St. Louis, San Francisco and Washington, D.C.

In the ghettos of each, passions of the more rebellious Negro youths are still inflamed by the memory of Watts, where there was a toll of 34 killed, 947 injured and $45 million in property damage. To them, Watts is the road to national attention. The Oakland report transmits the feeling:

"While there are moderates in the Negro community who do not want violence, there are those, especially among the younger element, who do. To these latter, Watts is a symbol and slogan for action. One hears repeatedly from the younger people: 'We need a Watts here: It's the only way to get action; it's the only way to make 'em listen.' "

"Serious Unemployment Problem"

Oakland's Republican mayor, John C. Houlihan, confirms the seriousness of his city's racial tension. "We're very much aware of it," he declares. "We acknowledge and have known for many years that we've had a serious unemployment problem among our minority residents, and as a matter of fact my administration came into office 4½ years ago on a program to attract industry back to Oakland to provide more jobs."

Reprinted With Permission

The Oakland problem has been aggravated both by a large influx of job-seeking Negroes from the South—similar to the Watts pattern—and by what Mr. Houlihan describes as "lower-level white agitators from out-of-state" who are trying to stir up minority groups. Still, the mayor does not see rioting as an imminent threat. He pins his hope for peace on a "very large stable element" of Negro homeowners and businessmen who would stand to suffer greatly from violence.

He also notes that Oakland's poverty and racial problems have received constant attention since he took office in 1961. Some $45 million of Federal funds has been poured into the city for antipoverty, job training and related programs, besides $4.5 million in Ford Foundation money that was spent on Oakland as a pilot antipoverty project. Nevertheless, Mayor Houlihan admits the situation is "not greatly improved," and he displays more than a trace of irritation at the Washington way of doing things.

While representatives of Great Society agencies descend on the nation's Negro ghettos with a sincerity of purpose and a regularity that can be encouraging to local residents, the lack of clear-cut results can seem frustrating to them. In Oakland, there is a Community Relations Service man, an Office of Economic Opportunity man, a Labor Department man, a Commerce Department man, and so on; yet the Government's own analysis criticizes its efforts for ineffectiveness.

Pessimistic About Programs

There are three Neighborhood Youth Corps projects in Oakland, but the report relates that "only one seems to have (the Negroes') respect." There are a half-dozen training programs, sponsored by the old Area Redevelopment Administration, but the report says these "will cover less than 400 people in almost two years' time and apparently do not reach the people who need training the most." There is a larger Labor Department training program, but the report declares that it "has less than 500 unemployed enrolled for training in a three-year period." The report concludes that a lack of public knowledge of the programs is partly to blame for the limited participation.

Despite this uninspiring record, those who have examined Oakland are recommending more Federal action. "There is still some time in which to work, if we begin at once with some tangible programs which will reach the residents of the affected communities. This will have a cooling effect, strengthen the hand of the more moderate Negro leadership, and give concerned agencies valuable time to organize a longer constructive program, urgently needed in Oakland."

But the Negroes of Oakland seem doomed to further disappointment if they're counting on big new Federal help soon. Since Oakland is one of the smaller "high tension" cities, its wants may get rather low priority in Washington. Furthermore, the President is doing his best to hold the fiscal 1967 version of the Great Society, including antipoverty and economic development programs, as close to this year's level as possible. All of which suggests that the Oakland tension could continue to build. At any rate, the report warns:

"There is sufficient mistrust, disaffection, and frustration building up in the Negro community to make the situation potentially explosive. This opinion is shared by most of the people talked to, their views differing only in degree. Many thoughtful people, both Negro and white, believe that the influx of minority population during the past five years, the worsening of the economic situation, particularly among the minority groups, the lack of any concrete remedial action, have resulted in a dangerous build-up of resentment, and that this is on the increase."

Detailed Look at Oakland

Because Oakland reflects racial unrest elsewhere, its problems are worth examining in detail. The secret report on the city was prepared within weeks after the Watts riot and has since been confirmed by unpublicized on-the-spot inspections by Washington officials.

At the core of Oakland's plight is unemployment. Federal visitors to West Oakland, a ghetto area in which nearly 63% of the 77,100 population is Negro, say they're bombarded by the plea, "We want jobs, jobs, jobs." The official report declares: "Unemployment is very high among Negroes; it is approximately 10% for whites, about 20% or more for Negroes and even higher for Negro youth."

This frustration, the report continues, "leads to charges of discrimination in employment"—charges that extend to placement efforts by the Government's own U.S. Employment Service. "Feeling against the employment office is high," the report says. "Many (Negroes) state that it is a waste of time to even register at these offices; they complain of the treatment (they receive) when they do register."

But there is another side to the job problem. "Some employers state they want to hire Negroes but cannot get qualified applicants," the report says. "Most of the Negroes lack skills; large numbers also need basic education."

It's for this reason that the Oakland inspectors are recommending a fresh effort to meet the special needs of the ghetto. As the keystone, the report urges establishment of a "skill development and training center," similar to one created in Detroit. It would concentrate on training the hard-core unemployed by coordinating existing training projects and tying them more closely to job openings.

Possibility of Transit Jobs

The report sees the Bay Area Rapid Transit project, a high-speed train system that will connect San Francisco with suburban areas, as a "wonderful opportunity" to place the unemployed. Some 8,000 construction jobs are expected to be available for a number of years, to be followed by up to 2,000 maintenance and operation jobs. The report warns that "if crews are brought in from outside the Bay area, and these are bound to be largely whites, when so many thousands of local minority residents are unemployed, a dangerous situation will quickly result."

Besides unemployment, Oakland is beset by many other problems. "The Negro school population has increased approximately 15% in the last five years," the report declares. "More classroom space and more teachers are urgently needed. Parents complain of 'push-outs,' that children are suspended or expelled for non-serious infractions of the rules. School board officials deny this, claiming the existence of serious behavior problems. Negro mothers concerned with the problem, who have volunteered their services, have met with rebuffs and are still trying to get the school authorities to accept their help."

Housing is another sore spot, being aggravated by Government-sponsored urban renewal. The report tells this story: "The urban renewal project in East Oakland with its slum clearance removed housing of the poor. The many acres of cleared land are being readied for the Acorn Project where the rents for a one-bedroom apartment will start at $100 a month and go up. Even the employed worker earning from $4,000 to $5,000 a year with many dependents—families of six and nine children are not uncommon—would be totally unable to come back to this area. The result is an overcrowding and further downgrading of the housing in West and North Oakland."

Then there's the charge of police brutality. "One hears this complaint everywhere," the report asserts. "It is denied by the police and repeated by minority group members and some whites. . . . Communication between the people of the area and the police (has) broken down completely."

As the report suggests, the validity of the Negro complaints is open to challenge. But the Negroes believe their grievances to be real, and the Oakland report warns against "indifference" on the part of California and Washington officialdom. It sums up the mood of the ghetto in these words:

"Repeatedly one hears: 'Nobody listens, nobody cares.' Now a potent new ingredient has been added. There has been a 'Watts' and Watts is getting attention and action. This has made an impact."

Ash Wednesday NEWSLETTER February 23, 1966

ESCRU REPRESENTATIVE TO AFRICA?

At its meeting in Brooklyn, January 14 - 16, the Board of Directors voted to send a spokesman to Southern Rhodesia and South Africa as a demonstration of support for Churchmen there who are standing against the spread of racism if special funds for such a journey are found. Other Board actions included a petition to Executive Council calling for National Church resources and staff to assist dioceses facing potential Watts-type situations. For actions not reflected in this Newsletter, write for a copy of the minutes.

6TH ANNUAL MEETING: New York, November 11 - 13

ESCRU will focus on the Church & Northern Urban Areas at this year's Annual Meeting scheduled for New York City in mid-November. Originally set for May, but shifted by the ESCRU Board, the conference will follow fall meetings of Executive Council and the House of Bishops at a time when the Church's response to the Summer of '66 may demand a hard look toward the future. The Rev. Layton Zimmer of Philadelphia is Chairman of the Planning Committee. Let him know of your concerns and make plans now to attend. More on plans later.

THE CHAPTERS REPORT.....

Atlanta: Getting underway with Samuel Burns as Chairman. Panel program with spokesmen from all local civil rights groups.
Boston: Steady involvement via diocesan structures. Joint activities with Catholic Interracial Council, Deep in Boston School Committee problem.
CENTRAL NEW YORK: No Chapter news. Bishop Higley joined in supporting "bussing" to relieve racial imbalance in schools.
Chicago: Sponsoring series of workshops on "Theology of Freedom Movement." Will present its Bishop Lichtenberger Award to Jonathan Daniels posthumously at Annual Dinner on Feb. 20th.
CLEVELAND: Successfully sought new diocesan canons on non-discriminatory sale & rental of church properties. Heard ESCRU Executive Director on Jan.28th.
CONNECTICUT: Organizing into sub-divisions in Hartford, New Haven & Fairfield County under new Chairman, Rev.Reul Kaighn.
DELAWARE: Newly chartered chapter under leadership of Winnie Lang. Successfully sponsored diocesan statements on investment of Church funds & housing.
HOUSTON: Sponsored public meeting with ESCRU staffer Malcolm Boyd speaking. Sent $500. to national ESCRU. The Rev. John Sanders, Rector of city's integrated parish, new Chairman.
INDIANAPOLIS: No Chapter news.
IOWA: Planning for ESCRU role at May diocesan convention.Lots of new members.

Equality Sought Some 25 persons demonstrated in behalf of equal placement opportunities for Negro Episcopalian priests Sunday night prior to the annual convention of the Episcopal Diocese of Minnesota at St. John the Evangelist Church, St. Paul. The demonstrators claimed that there is a gap between the official position of the church, which favors equal opportunities for Negro priests, and the practices of individual congregations. The demonstration was sponsored by the Minnesota chapter of the Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity and the University of Minnesota Episcopal Student Association.

.....WHAT THEY ARE DOING

KANSAS CITY: Appeared before committee of state legislature to support fair housing act. Support of diocesan involvement in local Alinsky project.
LONG ISLAND: Clothing sent to Mississippi, following Annual Meeting last fall. Earl Duncan got his union to help long-term.
LOS ANGELES: To have booth and luncheon meeting at time of diocesan convention.
MAHONING-SHENANGO(Ohio-Penna. area) Fall program on Justice & the Jury System. Chairman: John H. Morris.
MARYLAND: Seeking greater integration of the Church Home & Hospital.
MICHIGAN: Heard Dr. Robert Spike on February 1st & considered proposals for more effective work at the local parish level. Chapter has agreed to direct ESCRU's plans in preparation for Seattle General Convention, at request of Board.
MILWAUKEE: Case of the Rev. Wm. J. Miles, arrested in demostration against de-facto school desegregation December 6th, still pending. Integration of suburban housing a coming concern of chapter.
MINNESOTA: See photo & account to the left. Chapter developing work with young Churchmen under leadership of Mrs. Johnson & Mrs. Hillsley.
MISSOURI: Follow-up support of Delta Ministry projects by members of St. Stephen's & others in ESCRU.
NEWARK: Under new Chairman, the Rev. Ivan Backer, organizing into sub-divisions in Jersey City, Patterson and Newark.

THE LATEST FROM FERNANDINA

President Peabody reported to the January ESCRU Board meeting that it appears steps are being taken in the Diocese of Florida to alter the situation where a new structure has been built for the Negro congregation on the same city block where the white congregation worships in its more-than-ample edifice. The Board took no action but vowed to wait and watch developments. A copy of the report prepared by the ESCRU delegation which visited Florida to investigate the matter will be supplied on request. We hope to be able to report in the next newsletter how the situation has been resolved.

THE CHURCH AND THE RIOTS: A SPECIAL REPORT

Only the second of ESCRU "Special Reports" (the first was on the situation at St. Paul's College, Virginia), the document offering "Guidelines for Diocesan Strategy in Northern Urban Areas" is being widely used in the Church and elsewhere. Published on January 16th, the report was prepared by five priests intimately familiar with the situation in the Watts district of Los Angeles and similiar situations in the country. Single copies may be had at no charge. They are 25¢ in quantity. A reprint from the WALL STREET JOURNAL is enclosed wherein there is ample evidence of the Church's need to look ahead to the possible eruption of crisis in other communities across the land.

YES, WE'RE LATE with this Newsletter! The last was sent October 28th. Sorry, but the staff has been busy in the office and on the road. Stines & Dreisbach to South Carolina, and the latter to numerous chapter areas. Stines on several expeditions for the "Team Ministry to Southern Cities" effort in which we cooperate. Morris on an extensive tour of the West Coast and North Central region, etc. But, here we are, and we'll hope to have more word to you sometime in April. All the while the administrative and coordinative tasks multiply at the national office. While other organizations interested in racial matters report attrition, ESCRU is expanding its program - trying to serve the Church better.

NEW YORK: January 13th meeting to determine if Chapter should or can be revived. Canon Dennis to head up continuing committee.
NORTHERN VIRGINIA: New Chairman, Paul W. McGann, reports that Alexandria's Episcopal High will open its doors this year. Applicants are needed.
PENNSYLVANIA: Fernandina situation prompted look at comparable scandal close to home; action pending.
PITTSBURGH: No Chapter news.
RHODE ISLAND: Heard former SCLC staffer C. T. Vivian (now with Urban Training Center).
RICHMOND: Endeavoring to have House of Bishops' stand on clergy placement made known in diocese.
SAN DIEGO: National ESCRU Board acknowledged approvingly efforts by Directors Fenton & Oliver to counter right-wing speakings of the Rev. Robert Watts. Fr. Fenton is also Chapter chairman. Plans to witness to Church's teaching while he spoke at Naval Base in San Diego brought unexpected cancellation of speaking engagement.
WASHINGTON: Met on January 19th to consider backing best candidates as Deputies from diocese to the General Convention. Chairman Karl Nordling (also national Director of ESCRU) will coordinate preparation of "Special Report" on persistent scandal in the Diocese of Alabama, with particular reference to role of the diocesan bishops. (Alabama laymen recently led effort to restore financial support of NCC, over episcopal demurrers.)

HAS YOUR PARISH PUT ESCRU IN THE BUDGET?

Vestries of parishes in both Texas and Alabama have included $100. in their budgets for ESCRU. They are but two congregations which have made a commitment for the sake of the parish, as well as for the good of ESCRU. There are others. As the enclosed budget sheet indicates, ESCRU received a total of $2,019.00 from parishes and Church organizations last year. These parishes realize that there is an educational and symbolic value to them in making an allocation in behalf of racial and cultural unity. Will you see if your parish does this and, if not, talk with the Rector and Vestry about it? Also, BCW and other groups in the Church have found this is a helpful instrument for both firming up their own commitment. Certainly it is an invaluable source of support for ESCRU and the primary one to be developed for the sake of all.

FATHER STINES GOES TO WASHINGTON

ESCRU's Director of the Southern Field Service program, the Rev. Henri A. Stines, is leaving after two years in Atlanta to become the Rector of the Church of the Atonement, Washington, D. C. There he succeeds the Rev. Quinland Gordon, long-time veteran of ESCRU efforts, who has gone to the Division of Christian Citizenship at Executive Council. Fr. Stines has been a great support to countless persons in the South, both in the time of crisis and through quiet, unpublicized work behind the scenes. In expressing "great personal loss" at his departure, ESCRU's Board of Directors certainly spoke for the rest of the staff. We wish him Godspeed, and his family as well, taking some comfort in the fact that he will undoubtedly add great strength to our Washington Chapter. Also, he will become ESCRU's representative to the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, a position previously shared most ably by Bishop Paul Moore and Mrs. Morag Simchak who will continue to work with him in this responsibility.

ESCRU AND THE PEACE MOVEMENT

On December 2nd I prepared a memorandum for Directors & Chapter Chairmen indicating that ESCRU had taken no position on the Vietnam War issue and expressing my personal conviction that we should not do so. I believe that ESCRU members, and other civil rights adherents, have valid and honest differences on this matter and feel that as ESCRU it is our responsibility to focus on the concerns outlined in our Statement of Purpose. In that memorandum I revealed my own tentative judgements on the situation. I'll send a copy on request. I should like to add here that Churchmen certainly do have a responsibility as Church to be deeply concerned with this subject. The Episcopal Pacifist Fellowship is an organization with a modus operandi in this area. They can be addressed at: 9 E. 94th St., New York, N.Y. 10028. - J.B.M.

THE JONATHAN DANIELS MEMORIAL FUND

ESCRU has sent over $1000.00 to the Selma Interreligious Project for welfare and relief work in the Selma area as a results of contributions to our special fund in memory of Jon Daniels. The work of the Selma project, under the direction of the Rev. Francis Walter, is going most successfully. Sponsored by the major national Church & Synagogue organizations which were so deeply involved in Selma in the spring, S.I.P. has yet to receive support from the Episcopal Church officially, as from other denominations, but it is hoped this will be provided before too long. If you want to be on their mailing list, write Fr. Walter at 810 29th Avenue, Tuscaloosa, Alabama. - - Another memorial fund for Jonathan Daniels has been begun by the Episcopal Theological School at Cambridge, Mass., where he was a student. This will support the involvement of seminarians in areas of continuing social concern. For a brochure write Mrs. Owen Thomas, 99 Brattle St., Cambridge, Mass.

"CHARTERS SHALL BE SUBJECT TO RENEWAL ANNUALLY"

So says the ESCRU By-laws, but until this year we haven't done much about it. At its January meeting the Board renewed the charters of all chapters save New York, but gladly recognized that efforts are in process to determine future ESCRU possibilities in the Diocese of New York. Charters for the following chapters were renewed, but "with concern for their present status": Atlanta, Indianapolis, Long Island, Los Angeles, Missouri (St. Louis), New Jersey, Northern Virginia, Pennsylvania and Richmond. Concern, in this instance, means that the national office has reason to believe that the Chapter may not be as active as it could be. In some instances it may be simply that we have not received copies of local minutes, newsletters or meeting notices & are unaware of what is happening. In other situations a committed local Chairman may not be getting enough support from other local members. It was the Board's intention to be of help to the Chapters by starting to exercise its review responsibilities.

OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, October 22, 1965

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, the Episcopal Society for Cultural & Racial Unity, a nationwide organization of bishops, priests, and laity of the Episcopal Church, headquartered at 5 Forsyth Street NW., Atlanta, Ga., recently held its fifth annual meeting in Jackson, Miss. In view of the gunning down of the Selma, Ala., based ESCRU field representative, Jonathan M. Daniels, on August 20, and the serious injury sustained by a Roman Catholic priest, the Reverend Richard Morrisroe, I was deeply concerned at the time that adequate steps be taken to insure the safety of the participants in the meeting. I urged the Department of Justice to take all appropriate measures to this end, and I am happy to report that the conference proceeded without incident.

Among their activities were firsthand inspection in the delta of church work and voter registration projects. ESCRU has made a fine record in encouraging progress in the field of civil rights and all human rights for all Americans. The executive director of ESCRU, the Reverend John B. Morris, is one of the most respected priests of the Episcopal Church. The assistant director, the Reverend Albert Dreisbach, Jr.; one of the field representatives, the Reverend Malcolm Boyd; and the director of the southern field service, the Reverend Henri A. Stines, are all experienced priests of the Episcopal Church with full-time responsibility in the field of civil rights and in bringing about cultural and racial unity.

Mr. Frederick H. Sontag of Montclair, N.J., who has since been named consultant to the national board of ESCRU in recognition of his long-time work in the field of civil rights, has called to my attention the fact that originally the conference program included a talk entitled, "Selma, a Continuing Ministry of Presence," by Jonathan Daniels. Before the conference was held, the tragedy at Selma occurred. In a sense the conference became a living memorial to Jonathan Daniels. I am glad that New Jersey Episcopal priests, laymen, and laywomen had a share in these sessions.

ESCRU A CALL for UNITY

HOW WOULD YOU FEEL if you were greeted on a Sunday morning in an Episcopal Church with the words "You god-damned scum"? This is exactly what was said to Jonathan Daniels last year at St. Paul's Church in Selma, Alabama.

Voices like this drove Jonathan Daniels to go to Alabama; and they finally propelled the shot which killed him last August in Hayneville, Ala.

The life of Jonathan Daniels exemplifies at its best what The Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity stands for. It was no accident that he worked under the auspices of ESCRU, the initials by which the Society is better known.

ESCRU began in response to the voices of fear and isolation within the Episcopal Church. Its one objective is to break down the walls of separation between men, be they barriers of race, class or culture; be they within the Church or without.

Today, ESCRU is still in its infancy, having begun in the early part of 1959 largely through the vision and labors of its present Executive Director, the Rev. John B. Morris. Both laymen and clergy constitute the membership of approximately 5,000. Of the 1,200 clerical members, 50 are bishops. Both bishops in the Diocese of Newark are members.

Since its inception ESCRU has witnessed militantly to the frequent discrepancy between official Church statements and specific instances of discrimination within the life of the Church itself. In 1961, for instance, a group of ESCRU members undertook a prayer pilgrimage in which they visited many of the Church's institutions, especially schools, that were still segregated. The most publicized of these is Lovett School in Atlanta, which has frequently been picketed by ESCRU members. In spite of this action the school still has not integrated, and more tragically, the Church has not severed all its ties with the school. ESCRU has also been one of the cooperating groups in the civil rights struggle in Selma, and in many other communities.

Corporate and individual actions of this kind are only one way of realizing ESCRU's objectives. Teaching and worship also play an important role. A great deal of useful information is widely distributed by ESCRU. In addition, each specific action program is supported by a carefully prepared statement explaining its necessity. The reasons for the particular project are derived from the Church's teachings. Central to all the society undertakes is prayer and worship, and the strength that comes from shared concern.

The ultimate objective of ESCRU is not merely the absence of racial and cultural barriers, although under today's conditions this must of necessity be its main thrust. The society's goal is the kind of harmony which comes from a shared recognition of the Lordship of Jesus Christ, "so that brothers may dwell together in unity and see Him so lifted up that He will draw all men unto Him."

"I do not pray for these only, but also for those who are to believe in me through their word . . . that they may be one even as we are one, I in them and thou in me, that they may become perfectly one, so that the world may know that thou hast sent me and hast loved them even as thou hast loved me." John 17: 20-23

ESCRU's objectives are, therefore, a direct outgrowth of the Church's teaching. The only difference is that whereas the Church at large has sometimes ignored them, ESCRU is trying to work toward the realization of these goals. The Society is better able to do this because it is completely outside the structure of the institutional Church. It receives no money from Episcopal headquarters and is supported entirely by voluntary contributions.

Maximum flexibility in designing and executing its programs is a result of this independence. ESCRU's headquarters are located in Atlanta, but much of its work is done locally through 28 affiliated chapters.

And that brings us to Newark, and our own Diocese. Our diocesan conventions have passed good resolutions urging a greater degree of social justice for all men. We favor a broad representation along multi-racial and multi-cultural lines on all diocesan-wide committees. Resolutions in favor of open housing, school desegregation, impartial law enforcement have all passed.

These diocesan policies could not have been adopted without a broad-based support for civil rights among Episcopalians in our Diocese. But it is one thing to pass resolutions, and another to carry out their intention. We believe, however, that there are many concerned churchmen who want to participate in more meaningful ways of working actively for racial justice and the unity of all men. If you are concerned, ESCRU offers you an opportunity to work with fellow Episcopalians in breaking down racial and cultural barriers in the Diocese of Newark.

Many of us are already working toward this objective in the communities where we live. But this is not enough. We are members of communities, other than where we sleep. We belong to the Diocese of Newark, and therefore, to the greater community of northern New Jersey. We are members of the Christian Church through the national Episcopal Church and therefore we are concerned for the whole nation. ESCRU provides the opportunity to witness to our concern for these large communities to which we all belong.

Many voices are being raised today: some on the side of bigotry and hatred; others on the side of love and harmony. But voices need hands to implement intentions. ESCRU is a means through which to make your voice heard for the unity of all mankind, and to lend your hands in making this a reality in which all men will be equal children of the One God.

If you would like to join ESCRU, or if you would like to receive more information about it, please tear off the coupon on this page and mail it.

This is a call to unity. Or, as Jonathan Daniels put it:

> We are beginning to see as we never saw before that we are truly in the world and yet ultimately not of it. For through the bramble bush of doubt and fear and supposed success we are groping our way to the realization that above all else, we are called to be saints. That is the mission of the Church everywhere. And in this, Selma, Alabama is like all the world: it needs the life and witness of militant saints.

MEMORANDUM

April 28, 1966

TO: Various Friends & Colleagues

FROM: The Rev. John B. Morris

RE: Direct Action & Apartheid in southern Africa

Purpose & Standing of this Memo - This is exploratory and suggestive in nature, with a hope that some recipients may want to respond in kind; or, indeed, that it may reach persons far more competent in this area who are prepared (or are preparing) to follow through somehow and who will favor us with information on their plans.

The Board of Directors of ESCRU turned its attention to the issue of Apartheid in southern Africa at its January, 1966, meeting; and I take my cue from that insofar as the legitimacy of the topic for ESCRU's Executive Director. However, it should be noted that the analysis and suggestions set forth herein are my own only. Our Board did authorize the sending of some representative to southern Africa, as a token of our interest in the situation, if special funds could be found. We are still desirous of following through in such terms, but this memorandum is not about that.

The Thesis - Simply, that there is an emerging rightness and ripeness for the consideration of forms of direct action protest and witness aimed at racism in the southern part of Africa by American organizations concerned for these issues in this country.

In Substantiation - Following are random observations and thoughts which prompt my own growing concern:

1. The present crisis in Southern Rhodesia extends one of the first "handles" whereby the whole apartheid complex can be taken ahold. Having been joined there, it seems unlikely that the issue of world concern over apartheid will return to the impasse which generally obtained vis-a-vis South Africa up until now.

2. Racist forces in this country are mobilizing at a faster rate, it would appear, in their defense of UDI in Southern Rhodesia, than are liberal forces accelerating such interest and activity as they have maintained all along. Full-page ads have been appearing of late in newspapers defending the Ian Smith regime against criticism.

3. There is an integral connection between what is happening, and what may happen, with reference to apartheid, and the mood and future of race relations in this country. Imagine, for instance, that Britain is not able to significantly alter the racist trends in Southern Rhodesia (whether or not any compromise plan is effected) and greater Chinese Communist activity develops in that country. In the event of some eventual revolutionary move under such circumstances, the United States would create serious problems at home (adding to the polarization already engendered by Watts and subsequent comparable situations) if she remained neutral, and even more serious repercussions would ensue if we threw our support to what would be touted as a beleagured white minority.

4. It seems right and inevitable to me that forces of good concerned for racial justice in this country should follow-through with an investment of time, money and effort in the southern Africa situation. That the Republic of South Africa is a separate and independent nation (not obligated to respect our Supreme Court!) offers only a tactical difference for our consideration when compared to emerging interest in this country with the sometime sovereign State of Mississippi that culminated in the Freedom Rides of 1961. Higher laws and commitments bind us to a momemtum that ultimately carries the same message to South Africa irrespective of the fact that there may be little security or relief available from a Federal Judiciary.

5. The ripeness for greater American involvement in Southern Rhodesia and South Africa is to be traced both to the situation as emerging there, as well as to our own domestic situation. Concerning the latter, we know full well that the state of race relations in this country is precarious, in spite of legislation and government initiative in various programs. Some will say there is too much to do here; but we have never operated in the Civil Rights Movement on the assumption that one problem must be settled before another is raised. All issues, ultimately, are dealt with concurrently. I think an argument could be made for an internal necessity, in terms of our domestic well-being, for American initiative against apartheid.

6. Within the council of nations we had best, both officially and unofficially, begin to show commensurate concern for the spread of "international racism" as we have well-demonstrated for the spread of "international communism". Any integrity in our commitments against Communism in Southeast Asia will be, in part, validated by equal concern for the more destructive tyranny of racism.

7. We cannot start too soon to educate and sensitize the American public to the evils of apartheid, nor should the task be underestimated. I believe that English-speaking ties and the like, causing many Americans to feel a "kith and kin" regard for the industrious white South African, give us an enormous task in terms of simply eliciting sympathy and support for the oppressed in South Africa. We take it too much in stride that several thousands in South Africa are in prison or under house arrest for their criticism of governmental policies. Our feeling of detachment has too many similiarities to our neutrality in the early days of Hitler's purge of Jews. All of this suggests that a first goal in any action is to develop more American concern.

A Proposal - So much for various things that undergird my thesis, and I am the first to acknowledge that I am a novice and learner with regard to the southern Africa situation. Groups such as the American Committee on Africa are the informed agencies which have long-since committed themselves to greater American initiative, and especially with reference to U. S. policies and American business interests. For what it is worth, though, I add here the proposal that a coalition of secular and religious agencies consider the sponsoring of the equivalent of a "Freedom Ride" to South Africa. A carefully planned, and responsibly executed, "Sail-In", bearing documents of our official American commitments to an open and integrated society, would seem a viable and highly symbolic way of conveying our message of concern to South Africa and, more importantly, of alerting citizens back home to this remaining frontier of racism. Would we sail from here, or begin further up the African coast or, indeed, have a delegation go by some other means? I don't know. These are the questions that a representative group could determine. The issue at hand, as I see it, is to devise a sufficient way of showing that we care: for the sake of support for internal resistance in South Africa, and to mobilize American sentiment more and more against the system of apartheid. A crack-pot idea? Yes, at first glance at least. But of such ideas have new movements and combinations of power started. Whatever the form, it is time for action by those of us who have the freedom to act.

6TH ANNUAL MEETING SET FOR NEW YORK CITY IN FALL. JAMES FARMER TO SPEAK. WILL FOCUS ON NORTHERN CITY

Dr. Pettigrew

Mr. Farmer

Fr. Harmon

ESCRU's Role & Future To Be Evaluated

The former head of CORE, James Farmer, will address the 6th Annual Meeting of ESCRU which convenes in New York, November 10-13, with sessions to be held at the Cathedral, St. Philip's, and St. Martin's. Also speaking will be Father John Harmon of Packard Manse in Boston, and Dr. Thomas F. Pettigrew of Harvard's Department of Social Relations. The Rev. Gladstone Ntlabati of South Africa will tell about apartheid, and the Rev. Frs. Arthur Walmsley and Quinland Gordon will participate in the session evaluating the Church's witness in the racial revolution. Other speakers and resource personnel will be reported later when hotel information is sent. There will be a free evening for seeing the city, but with summer just passed there will be much to consider together. Make your plans now to attend. More information in September.

NOMINATING COMMITTEE APPOINTED

Eight positions on ESCRU's national Board of Directors are to be filled by a process of mail balloting by members in the 8 stateside Provinces of the Church. President Peabody has appointed Mr. Everett Bell of Houston to chair the committee which will prepare the ballot. Send suggestions to him for the Director from your province. (Cont. page 8)

ACLU/ESCRU ALABAMA SUIT WON

Several days after Jon Daniels was shot last August, the American Civil Liberties Union filed a case in Federal Court against the Jury Commissioners of Lowndes County where, subsequently, an all white jury acquitted Jon's murderer. ESCRU and its staff joined the suit shortly thereafter. In February the Court ruled that the jury rolls must be made to reflect the county's population, which is preponderantly Negro, and, further, that Alabama's exclusion of women from juries is unconstitutional.

CHAPTERS MOBILIZE FOR SEATTLE

To support the proposals for reforms in the General Convention structure & procedure, detailed in a letter to all members March 18th, ESCRU Chapters have begun to work on the election of effective Deputies to represent their diocese at the Church's triennial convention in Seattle scheduled for the fall of 1967. Washington ESCRU worked quietly behind the scenes before and after their diocesan convention to successfully elect deputies sympathetic to the proposals. Newark ESCRU asked potential deputies their views and (Cont. page 8)

NORTH CAROLINA PRIEST TO JOIN ESCRU STAFF

The Rev. David B. Nickerson, Vicar of St. Titus' in Durham will move to Atlanta in July to become Director of ESCRU's Southern Field Service program, the position previously held by the Rev. Henri Stines. Fr. Nickerson is originally from Florida and did his seminary work at Crozer and the General Seminary. Before going to Durham he served on the staff of St. Andrew's Church, Wilmington, Del., and prior to that he was in the ministry of the Methodist Church. His position with ESCRU, which is funded by a grant from the Field Foundation, will involve him in the Civil Rights Movement in the South and in various ecumenical efforts at reconciliation.

Fr. Nickerson

ESCRU GOES TO STOCKHOLDERS MEETING

In the first action of its kind, the Society's former President, the Rev. Joseph Pelham, will represent 5 shares of General Motors stock recently given ESCRU when their shareholders meet on May 20th, at which time he will inquire into the firm's intentions concerning Equal Employment policies in South Africa where it has extensive interests.

BRETHREN-dwell together in unity

LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE MOBILIZES

The Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, a coalition of religious and secular groups which was the primary source of support for the Civil Rights Bills of 1964 and 1965, met on May 5th to map out strategy for support of the President's recently introduced legislation on housing, jury reforms, and protection for civil rights workers. Fr. Henri Stines was there in behalf of ESCRU, which has been a part of the Conference for several years. Executive Council recently became an official participant, having been informally represented heretofore. Write your Congressman now in support of the new bill, and be ready for other efforts which may need your help - as in 1964 when Executive Council staff worked so effectively in mobilizing Churchmen to support new legislation.

STEWARDSHIP OF CHURCH FUNDS NEEDS SCRUTINY

ESCRU Board members and local chapter chairmen are to receive a packet of materials from Associate Director Dreisbach concerning "Church Investments and the Need for a More Responsible Stewardship." Ranging from a sheet on American investments in South Africa to descriptive data on the Interfaith Housing Corporation in Boston, which is headed up by ESCRU President Peabody, the packet is intended to help ESCRU Chapters and others raise questions with diocesan trustees, the Church Pension Fund, etc., regarding the investment of Church funds. A two-fold theory is operative: we should not continue to patronize and invest in firms which contribute to the maintenance of segregation (or, in South Africa, apartheid); while, on the other hand, there are increasing opportunities in investments for the Church to support and be the advocate of worthy undertakings, as in the field of housing.

SUPREME COURT WILL HEAR APPEAL OF ESCRU CASE

The U. S. Supreme Court has announced it will hear arguments in the appeal by four priests arrested in Jackson, Miss., in 1961, while on the Prayer Pilgrimage. After being acquitted, Frs. Pierson, Jones, Breeden and Morris, brought suit against the arresting officers and the judge. While finding in their favor on certain counts, the 5th Circuit struck the judge from the case and weighed the intentions of the clergy insofar as the legitimacy of their suit went. The American Civil Liberties Union became interested in the case and is working cooperatively with our attorney, Carl Rachlin (Chief Counsel for CORE), who, in turn, is ably assisted by Frederick A. O. Schwarz, Jr. It is anticipated that the case will come before the Court in the fall.

CURRICULUM STUDY HELP WANTED

Is there an educator in the membership who would do a study of Church School curriculum materials and how they affect racial attitudes for good or bad which we would publish? The Seabury Series and Morehouse publications would be included, as well as other series. Write the national office if you have experience in this field and believe that Church School is or can be important.

Bishop Myers and Fr. Gracie Discuss Northern Walkout

By THE RT. REV. C. KILMER MYERS
Suffragan Bishop

IT IS COMMONPLACE to say these days that the Church must seek new ways to minister relevantly in the inner city. This is especially true of the inner city parish. No longer may the parish situated in the deprived areas of our great cities ignore the crying needs of the communities and human beings in which they stand.

BISHOP MYERS

It is in recognition of this search for new ways that St. Joseph's Church, headed by the Reverend David M. Gracie, opened its doors to students of Northern High School. In this situation the only way the Church could show relevant interest was to identify itself with the issues which concerned the boycotting students. Very often a parish like St. Joseph's needs a "handle" which will enable it to "get into" the community. Usually such a handle is an issue which is of deep concern to the people, young and old, who live there. Father Gracie was sensitive to his neighborhood's needs and he therefore made himself available to a community in deep travail. I might add that he did this with my full approval as district head.

Obviously the school situation in Detroit, as in other great cities, is complicated. But one facet of the problem is clear: schools predominantly Negro in constituency generally are inferior as academic institutions when compared to schools in white urban areas and in the suburbs Everyone recognizes this.

Related to this is another disturbing fact: Negro parents generally play no role in up-grading their schools It is not that they avoid such a role. They are quite literally shut out of policy-making levels. This is not true in most other communities in which the opinions of organized parental groups are heeded and often acted upon by school authorities. Negroes in general have few ways to get through to policy-making groups either in education or other levels of metropolitan life. The only method open to them is that of direct, militant and organized action.

This was the situation at Northern High School as it attempted through its student leadership to meet the crisis in Negro education. Demonstrations, boycotts, parades are among the ways open to human beings with darker skins in our cities from North to South. The Church, located in the inner city, realizes this with increasing frequency. Very often such identification is not understood in human communities where access to civic and education authorities is more readily available.

Education is related to the process by which human beings reach their fullest capacity as humans. The Church which upholds the Incarnation — God coming among us as man — is concerned with the matter of humanness. This is central to its Gospel. It raises the questions: How may life become more human and how may the Church by its active posture help bring about the re-unification of the human race?

This was the primary reason for St. Joseph's involvement in the Northern High School controversy. We all should be grateful for the sensitive young minister who is the rector of that parish and for its vestry and parishioners who gave him support. I, as bishop in charge of the District, look upon the events of the past two weeks as still another indication of our Church's realistic identification with the issues of the inner city.

THE CHURCH AND RACE FUND

We continue to support giving by Episcopalians to Executive Council's "Church & Race Fund" as allocations from this source have always been to worthy causes. However, we should not be content to see the fund left as it is. Out of a total of $100,950. in grants in 1965, $64,000. went toward the Episcopal Church's contribution to the Delta Ministry and the Commission on Religion & Race of the National Council of Churches. Both agencies rightly deserve to be in the Episcopal Church's own national budget. As it is, our support of these ecumenical projects is on a voluntary basis. Even the money required for the promotion of the Fund derives from voluntary contributions, so that the Bishop of Alabama is quite correct if he chooses to tell his people that not one cent of their money goes toward NCC racial projects. The Department of Extension of the Diocese of Iowa, on the other hand, is on record to encourage the General Convention in 1967 to add the Church and Race Fund to the budget of the national Church. While there may always be need of a voluntary fund to supplement official commitments, it is clear that the Episcopal Church does not yet see the racial crisis as important budgetarily as numerous other programs which merit steady and annual support. Furthermore, Churchmen should demand of the Fund a degree of fearlessness it has not always shown, and all the moreso since it is voluntarily solicited. There is no indication that the Diocese of Alabama is throwing its weight behind the Fund because the Fund has thus far declined to make a grant to the Selma Interreligious Project, an ecumenical venture staffed by an Episcopal priest and officially supported by a number of other Church bodies.

ATTEND THE 6TH ANNUAL MEETING IN NEW YORK CITY

RACISM IN SOUTHERN AFRICA

ESCRU stands committed by Board action to send a representative to visit southern Africa as a witness to our concern for the growth of racist policies if funds are secured for this purpose. Such an expedition would, also, chiefly serve to inform us back home on conditions in South Africa and in Southern Rhodesia and to establish contacts there. A flyer is enclosed which seeks "Aid (for) Victims of South Africa's Racism". It is from the American Committee on Africa, an organization well-deserving of support by Churchmen. Exploring still other ways in which Americans might demonstrate concern for apartheid, ESCRU's Executive Director recently sent a memorandum to key civil rights leaders in this country proposing new forms of direct action against segregation in the southern part of Africa, including the possibility of something akin to the Freedom Rides. A copy of this memo will be sent on request. Ideas and reactions are invited.

LOS ANGELES CHAPTER OF ESCRU SPONSORS TUTORIAL PROGRAM IN WATTS AREA

Under the leadership of Murray McDougal, ESCRU has been reactivated in Los Angeles and is working cooperatively with diocesan officials on a number of programs. The photo to the left, taken by R. Dale Magee, shows Donna Bryan, a laboratory technician at UCLA, assisting Pamela Page of Lincoln Elementary School in Compton in her studies.

HERE AND THERE

With Bishop Stokes heading the effort, a Protestant Commission on Church and Race has been launched in Massachusetts to coordinate efforts of various churches concerned for justice and racial harmony. Staff for the combined effort will, presumably, obviate the re-staffing of the diocese's position previously held by ESCRU Vice-President, Fr. James P. Breeden, a factor which some ESCRU people are not enthusiastic about, but a wait-and-see attitude seems to prevail.....The Episcopal Church on the coast in the Old South continues to concentrate on garden and home tours, with St. Michael's, Charleston, going in for visits to old plantations. A newspaper account featured a photo of "the slave cabin row, which has been remodeled into guest houses...." .....In Jack Mendelsohn's The Martyrs (New York: Harper and Row, 1966) there is an account of how the news of Jonathan Daniels' death was received at Saint Paul's, Selma, where the Rector then denied permission for a memorial eucharist to be celebrated..... And further on books, ESCRU Field Representative Malcolm Boyd's Are You Running With Me, Jesus? drew the weekday review in THE NEW YORK TIMES, a rare tribute to a "religious" book, by the reviewer's own admission.....In Washington, Bishop Paul Moore came under heavy fire from conservative laymen for his outspoken stand in favor of Home Rule for the District of Columbia. The ESCRU Chapter issued a statement in his defense.....And across the river, twelve years after the Supreme Court's school desegregation decision, Episcopal High School "has quietly decided to desegregate", according to the Washington Post and earlier reports from the Northern Virginia Chapter of ESCRU. The Headmaster of EHS, which is presided over by Bishop Gibson & which lies adjacent to the Virginia Seminary, pointed out that there may be no Negro pupils since none have applied. Presumably this is partly because the decision to desegregate "was not made public at the time", according to the Post.....A right-wing periodical, THE CROSS AND THE FLAG, has advised Episcopalians unhappy with the "liberalism, Communism, mongrelization and skepticism" of their Church to contact James P. Dees, a former priest who is now "Bishop" of the so-called Anglican Orthodox Church. A lay leader of this sect in St. Louis recently quit when Dees reprimanded him for saying there were no racial bars to membership in the new group.

FREEDOM SCHOOL AT CHURCH

Charging inferior standards at Negro schools and in protest over the suppression of an editorial that was to have appeared in the student paper on the subject, over one thousand students of a high school in Detroit stayed away from classes. They went, instead, to "freedom school" classes set up at four local churches, including two Episcopal parishes - St. Joseph's and Grace. The former was the headquarters of much of the protest activity, causing the DETROIT NEWS to say that the school system could not be run "from the sidewalks, or from a nearby church rectory."

SURVEY OF INSTITUTIONS

ESCRU's survey of Church and Church-related institutions may never result in a comprehensive report, but it has caused innumerable schools, homes and hospitals, etc., to examine their present racial policies and, in some instances, take steps to implement their stated position. Because the situation has been so fluid since the survey was started two years ago, and because the data is incomplete in some areas, it will probably be best not to attempt publication. The greatest service has already been rendered in the asking of questions of these institutions, causing the issue of racial makeup to be raised before trustees, vestries and boards. Interesting tendencies were noted in the response to our inquiries, such as the fact that Northern Church-related institutions generally responded readily, as contrasted with a general reluctance or refusal on the part of facilities in the South to discuss their racial policies or makeup. Some of the latter, however, acknowledged they were segregated, although in instances where this is suspected we usually did not get a reply to repeated letters. Atlanta's Church-related Lovett School wrote finally indicating they were still segregated, although the Headmaster would prefer it not be so. Lovett's Baccalaureate Service this year will again be held at the Diocese of Atlanta's cathedral, the scene of picketing by local members of ESCRU last year. In the Diocese of Southwest Virginia, Boys Home, Inc., at Covington, presumably remains segregated since it remains probably the only institution having the designation "white" to appear in the 1966 Episcopal Church Annual. The results of our survey suggest that there are many more Church facilities which remain segregated by design and more than a few which desperately hope not to become the object of attention by Negro Churchmen.

OTHER REPORTS PENDING

ESCRU Director Karl Nordling will visit Alabama soon for fact-finding in preparation for writing ESCRU's "Special Report" on conditions in the Church there, as called for by January's Board meeting.....ESCRU's Vice-President, Fr. James P. Breeden, has been meeting with New York area clergy for consultation on a "Special Report" on clergy placement. Consideration is being given to further "haunting" of the House of Bishops on this subject when they meet in West Virginia in the fall, as when the six priests from ESCRU went to their meeting in Montana last year.

PARISH SPONSORS MARCHES DURING LENT

Witnessing to cultural and racial unity, and to protest job discrimination by utility companies in St. Louis, about 100 persons walked silently each Sunday afternoon during Lent past the company headquarters, with periodic pauses for prayer. Led by a huge wooden cross, the marchers were under the direction of St. Stephen's Church, which gave them the name of "Jericho Marches", recalling the account in Joshua 6:1-21.

Commenting on the marches, William Matheus, parish worker at St. Stephen's, said: "...people who had opposed the marches gradually became fascinated with the idea and were stirred by the commitment and dedication of those who plodded along Sunday after Sunday....things have not settled down yet, nor will they ever be the same again."

AROUND THE CHURCH

Kentucky has just adopted a Civil Rights Bill considered stronger than Federal legislation. Adoption was pushed by the Dean of the Cathedral in Louisville, the Rev. Robert W. Estill, who serves as Chairman of the state Commission on Human Rights. We'll send a brochure on the new laws on request. .....Savannah's "St. John's Church", which pulled out of Episcopal ranks last year rather than admit Negroes to services, has called a Methodist minister from Beaufort, S.C., to be associate rector... ....The Diocese of Washington called on its vestries and bishops to call and appoint clergy "on the basis of merit"; and in Los Angeles, Bishop Bloy did appoint the Rev. Atwell Stewart vicar of St. Mary's, Imperial Beach, succeeding the Rev. Frederick Fenton, Chairman of San Diego ESCRU, who has moved to the parish at Chula Vista. St. Mary's is predominantly white, while Fr. Stewart is of Negro ancestry.....The Diocese of South Carolina will desegregate its summer camps, but at the request of the Bishop will open them on an "all-boy, all-girl" basis.....Bishop West of Florida has refused to license ESCRU Director Fr. Robert Hampshire who is now teaching at a Negro college at St. Augustine where he had earlier participated in demonstrations sponsored by SCLC.

THE DELTA MINISTRY: AN OASIS

Seldom in the annals of Church History have various Church groups cooperated on so significant and pioneering an effort as the Delta Ministry. A flyer is enclosed on Freedom City, an exciting, bold idea to which DM is closely related. Stemming from the Hattiesburg Ministers' Project, which we helped to launch, and the ensuing Summer Project of 1964, the Delta Ministry's Chairman is former ESCRU Director Bishop Paul Moore, who has had to absorb a certain amount of abuse for his defense of DM in times of great criticism. Other Churchmen are working directly on the scene with DM, including Patricia Mutch, a former member of NYC ESCRU's Steering Committee. If you haven't already, we suggest you send DM an annual contribution and ask them to add you to mailing list.

JONATHAN DANIELS HONORED POSTHUMOUSLY

Former Presiding Bishop Arthur Lichtenberger and Mrs. Philip Daniels look at the "Bishop Lichtenberger Human Rights Award" cross just presented Mrs. Daniels by ESCRU's Executive Director on behalf of the Chicago Chapter of the Society at a dinner on February 20th. Mrs. Daniels' response, on receiving the award for her son, Jonathan, was cited in full in a letter from Fr. Morris to all ESCRU members on March 30th. Two days later Mrs. Daniels attended another dinner in Chicago honoring Fr. Richard Morrisroe who was wounded at the same time Jon was killed in Hayneville, Alabama, last August 20th. The Catholic Interracial Council of Chicago gave its annual award to Father Morrisroe. Also during February the Episcopal Diocese of Los Angeles adopted a memorial express-thanksgiving for the life and witness of Jonathan Daniels. A similiar resolution before the Convention of the Diocese of Arizona also proposed that the Liturgical Commission consider the appointment of Propers for a day to honor Jonathan, but this motion was tabled. Elsewhere preparations are being made for publication of a book on Jonathan, which will also contain some of his writings.

ROSTER OF CHAPTER CHAIRMEN

At the local level ESCRU is at work through 28 chapters spread across the country. Since we have not issued a Directory of such personnel for some time, the names & addresses of the heads of these local units are provided here. Members who have moved should advise the Chairman of their arrival so that they will be informed about local meetings and activities. Also, it is helpful to the well-being of the organization if local units will share their newsletters, etc., with chapters elsewhere.....

The Presiding Bishop's 1963 Whitsuntide Message

Recent events in a number of American communities—Birmingham, Chicago, Nashville, New York, and Raleigh, to mention only the most prominent—underscore the fact that countless citizens have lost patience with the slow pace of response to their legitimate cry for human rights. Pleas of moderation or caution about timing on the part of white leaders are seen increasingly as an unwillingness to face the truth about the appalling injustice which more than a tenth of our citizens suffer daily. While we are thankful for the progress that has been made, this is not enough.

Our Church's position on racial inclusiveness within its own body and its responsibility for racial justice in society has been made clear on many occasions by the General Convention. But there is urgent need to demonstrate by specific actions what God has laid upon us. Such actions must move beyond expressions of corporate penitence for our failures to an unmistakable identification of the Church, at all levels of its life, with those who are victims of oppression.

I think of the words we sing as we hail the ascended Christ, "Lord and the ruler of all men," and of our prayers at Whitsuntide as we ask God to work His will in us through His Holy Spirit. And then in contrast to our praises and our prayers our failure to put ourselves at the disposal of the Holy Spirit becomes painfully clear. Only as we take every step possible to join with each other across lines of racial separation in a common struggle for justice will our unity in the Spirit become a present reality.

It is not enough for the Church to exhort men to be good. Men, women and children are today risking their livelihood and their lives in protesting for their rights. We must support and strengthen their protest in every way possible, rather than give support to the forces of resistance by our silence. It should be a cause of rejoicing to the Christian community that Negro Americans and oppressed peoples everywhere are displaying a heightened sense of human dignity in their refusal to accept second-class citizenship any longer.

The right to vote, to eat a hamburger where you want, to have a decent job, to live in a house fit for habitation: these are not rights to be litigated or negotiated. It is our shame that demonstrations must be carried out to win them. These constitutional rights belong to the Negro as to the white, because we are all men and we are all citizens. The white man needs to recognize this if he is to preserve his own humanity. It is a mark of the inversion of values in our society that those who today struggle to make the American experiment a reality through their protest are accused of disturbing the peace—and that more often than not the Church remains silent on this, our greatest domestic moral crisis.

I commend these specific measures to your attention:

1) I would ask you to involve yourselves. The crisis in communities North and South in such matters as housing, employment, public accommodations, and schools is steadily mounting. It is the duty of every Christian citizen to know fully what is happening in his own community, and actively to support efforts to meet the problems he encounters.

2) I would also ask you to give money as an expression of our unity and as a sign of our support for the end of racial injustice in this land. The struggle of Negro Americans for their rights is costly, both in terms of personal sacrifice and of money, and they need help.

3) I would ask you to take action. Discrimination within the Body of the Church itself is an intolerable scandal. Every congregation has a continuing need to examine its own life and to renew those efforts necessary to insure its inclusiveness fully. Diocesan and church-related agencies, schools, and other institutions also have a considerable distance to go in bringing their practices up to the standard of the clear position of the Church on race. I call attention to the firm action of the recent Convention of the Diocese of Washington which directed all diocesan-related institutions to eliminate any discriminatory practices within six months. It further requested the Bishop and Executive Council to take steps necessary to disassociate such diocesan and parish-related institutions from moral or financial support if these practices are not eliminated in the specified time. I believe we must make known where we stand unmistakably.

So I write with a deep sense of the urgency of the racial crisis in our country and the necessity for the Church to act. Present events reveal the possible imminence of catastrophe. The entire Christian community must pray and act.

ARTHUR LICHTENBERGER
Presiding Bishop

A Call To Witness

Whitsunday, 1964

On May 17, 1964, we observe the tenth anniversary of the historic Supreme Court decision on school desegregation. At the same time the Church marks the Day of Pentecost or Whitsunday, commemorating the outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon Christ's followers who were gathered "all with one accord in one place." As a nation we look back on ten years that were too long in coming, conscious of how much further we have to go in implementation of the spirit of the Court's decision. As Churchmen we look back through the ages to our original wholeness and oneness in Christ, penitently aware of the departures we have taken from the unfragmented Body of Christ which was filled with power on Pentecost and overcame all barriers of tongue and race. From the past we turn to the present and future and know that God is calling us both as citizens and Churchmen to take bold steps that will witness to our unity in Him while there is yet time.

In Whitsuntide of last year the Presiding Bishop said: "Discrimination within the Body of the Church itself is an intolerable scandal. Every congregation has a continuing need to examine its own life and to renew those efforts necessary to insure its inclusiveness fully." He called upon Churchmen to take action for this. Now, on Whitsunday of 1964, there is no more appropriate time for action that will witness to and call forth the unity of all men in Christ. Let the Church be renewed and stand as a beacon to guide a perplexed nation. Let the Faithful in Christ Jesus come together each Sunday with one accord in one place, so that it can no longer be said to be the most segregated hour of the week. Let us put aside our old patterns of "separate-but-equal" congregations and so live together that it will be said: "Behold, how good and joyful a thing it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!" Let this begin with the witness of each Churchman who hears and responds to this call.

The Board of Directors of the Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity, having duly met in Atlanta, Georgia, on February 2-4, 1964, calls upon all Churchmen, and especially those who are members of the Society, to examine their situation to determine whether they may witness to the wholeness of the Church on Whitsunday of 1964, and thereafter, by transferring from their present parish to one where the members are predominantly of another color. We rejoice in those few congregations which already reveal the richness of God's handiwork and light the way for the rest of us.

We believe that the inclusiveness of the Church must be demonstrated by both Negro Churchmen transferring to predominantly white parishes, as well as by white Churchmen transferring to predominantly Negro parishes, but we would lay special emphasis on the latter. For too long have we expected the Negro alone to take the initiative. Because the Church is the People of God, and not the house in which they dwell, each congregation is equally important and intended to be inclusive of all persons. It has been necessary for the Negro American to lead the nation into freedom through his entry into places from which he was previously excluded. Now, let white Christians demonstrate their commitment by joining in minority status with Negro Churchmen. Neither may say he has no need of the other.

Let each witness as he is able and persuaded, all for the Glory of God. Let the Church in the cities rejoice in the witness and corporately march in solemn procession to accompany those who will transfer parishes. Let Whitsunday of 1964 more nearly find the people "all with one accord in one place." Let brothers dwell together in unity and see Him so lifted up that He will draw all men unto Him.

SING UNTO THE LORD A NEW SONG!

Praise the Lord, Negroes & whites! Praise the Lord!

Praise God in His sanctuary;
Receive Him, kneeling together.

Praise Him side by side, in the labors of your calling;
Share His joy in the fellowship of food and drink.

Praise God with open witness;
Praise Him with prayer and picket lines.

Praise Him with patient demonstration;
Praise Him with suffering and forgiveness.

Praise Him with responsible words;
Praise Him with the haunting truth of folk-song.

Let everything that hopes and strives and dares to Praise the Lord. / love

Praise God with your lives.

EPISCOPAL HIGH SCHOOL, ALEXANDRIA, VA.

HEADMASTER OUTLINES ADMISSIONS POLICY

For the Sunday Program of January 30, the Headmaster gave a talk on the admission policy of the High School regarding integration. He reviewed Episcopal's past experiences with the racial question and presented the present school position as expressed in the unanimous statement by the Board of Trustees issued at their December meeting.

Mr. Thomsen spoke on what he termed "a question that is of utmost importance to the High School and its supporters." He noted that for years many Old Boys had expressed concern over recent trends regarding integration. After reading a letter expressing such concern, he remarked that all should realize that a positive stance would be most beneficial to Episcopal. He observed that he would personally have reservations concerning the admission of a Negro for it would manifest, under present conditions, difficult problems of social adjustment to both the School and the Negro, but that E.H.S. should be prepared to accept all qualified candidates who seek admission.

Mr. Thomsen cited a number of instances in which the school profited by adopting a moderate racial stance, principally in the area of interscholastic athletics, and pointed out how attitudes have changed over the past years. Following this background, he read from the statement of the Board of Trustees:

"Any and all applicants for admission shall be considered on an equal basis after giving due regard to their scholastic preparedness and their ability and desire to meet the standards of the school. Special consideration shall be given to qualified applicants who are sons and close relatives of former students. The applicant's prospects for successful participation in the life of the school and the date of his application shall also be considered."

Mr. Thomsen stated that "the best interests of the school would be better served by accepting a clearly qualified Negro than by turning him down." He explained his belief as being a pragmatic one, not based just on right and wrong, but on the possible results of accepting or rejecting such a candidate.

The Headmaster then spoke of the consequences of such an acceptance. There would, of course, be a stream of protest from Old Boys, parents, and friends, but this would be counterbalanced as the school would be in accordance with conscience, the Episcopal Church, and the prevailing "law of the land." The Negro, if accepted, may not accept or attend only long enough to set the precedent. It would establish the willingness of the High School to integrate and would spare it the active opposition of the particularly active D.C. area civil rights groups.

On the positive side, the Headmaster spoke of how the cultural exchange between a Negro and E.H.S. boys would be an enlightening and socialy broadening experience since few Episcopal boys ever see the Negro in anything other than a subserviant capacity. Mr. Thomsen found this particularly valuable as the future Old Boys would occupy important positions in their respective communities in which the establishment and perpetuation of community relations would be an important task.

After reading a January 29th letter from an Old Boy concerning the Board statement, the Headmaster concluded by saying that the fears of the writer were unjustified in that there would be no active search for Negro candidates as is carried on by some Northern schools. The very lack of qualified Negro applicants and the corresponding adjustment problem they would have to face would militate against a colored student at Episcopal in the near future, but nevertheless, the school should be prepared to accept one.

MORE ON E.H.S.

Page 3, with its reference to Episcopal High School's change in admissions policy, was completed before we received the full account of Headmaster Thomsen's remarks, now reprinted to the left. They appeared in the school paper & epitomize the nature of "progress" oftentimes in the Church. How many other Church schools across the nation take the same position, but conceal it behind a facade of liberal protestation? That the number of Church-related schools in the South, started since 1954, greatly exceeds their growth elsewhere clearly reveals their correlation with the efforts of white Churchmen to escape integration in the public schools. Executive Council and the Episcopal School Association are not taking enough initiative to combat segregation in Church institutions. Each year makes the shame greater.

and then wrote all delegates to diocesan convention and ESCRU members about the issues at stake. Write the Chapter Chairmen (See page 5) if you are trying to organize effectively in your diocese and ask for a detailed picture of how they did it. If you want further information or clarification on the proposals, write to Mrs. George Edwards, 19925 Briarcliff, Detroit, Mich., or the Rev. Gordon Jones, 306 North Division, Ann Arbor, Mich. Also, keep them advised of progress in your area for support of the reform measures. During the summer Bishop Sterling will begin efforts to enlist other groups and concerned persons throughout the Church under the banner of "Episcopalians for Effective Conventions". FLASH: Rhode Island ESCRU sponsored a move at convention in support of the reforms.

Clerical Directors are to be elected this year from Provinces 1,2,3 and 7; with lay directors to be chosen from Provinces 4,5,6 and 8. The Nominating Committee must have your suggestions for vacancies by September 10th. Write: Mr. Everett Bell, Box 325, Texas Southern Univ., Houston, Texas 77004.

The following Directors' terms expire: Oliver, Stevens, Castle, Stringfellow, Willie, Hampshire, Frey, Lawrence, Dennis, Edwards, Breeden, and Myers. The last five may not be reelected to the Board for a period of one year, since they have servedtwo consecutive terms.

The following Directors' terms do not expire: Hood, Peabody, Nordling, Montgomery, Ward, Upham, Johnson, Saussy, Gray, Fenton, Hughes and Anderson.

STATEMENT

June 2,1966

Emory University's President Atwood rightly affirms that God has not left his campus, for God is surely no more dead at this citadel of Methodism than He is in any of Atlanta's ecclesiastical structures. The problem at Emory is that they have a controlled deity Who is conveniently shunted aside when such decisions as allowing the Lovett School on campus are made. It is apparent that Emory officials are more responsive to the old guard of Atlanta's power structure, represented on the Lovett Board of Trustees, than they are to God's spokesmen on campus who have been protesting the use of Emory's Glenn Memorial Auditorium for two years.

When Lovett holds its Commencement Exercises at Emory this coming Monday evening, it will be in spite of the fact that a committee of faculty visited President Atwood two years ago to protest allowing this segregated private school on campus; and in spite of the fact that Emory faculty and students picketed the Commencement ceremonies at Glenn Memorial last year. At that time the clergy at Glenn Memorial said that University officials had made the decision to allow Lovett in, while this year the University claims the clergy are responsible. It is plain that neither group wants to offend Atlanta's old guard, which appears to have successfully bought off the institution, as they have bought off most of Atlanta's ecclesiastical institutions, with the exception of the Roman Catholic Archdiocese.

To look at the list of Lovett trustees is to view the old guard of Atlanta's power structure in its most distilled form. Atlanta's progress in race relations has been made in spite of this coterie of bankers, lawyers, sometime gubernatorial aspirants and businessmen. They have retreated in their racial views only enough to insure their continued economic well-being, but they still hold tenaciously to the old order wherever they can, as at the Lovett School. They keep their money, derived from Atlanta's otherwise progressive spirit, in an old-line trust company.

OVER

They spend it at an exclusive driving club which is so segregated that not even the Metropolitan Opera can break through. They send their children to Lovett. And they tip their hats to God at the Cathedral of St. Philip and other socially prominent churches.

It is clear that God is no more dead at Emory than He is in Atlanta's other Churches and Church-related institutions to which this old guard seems to hold title. It is not so certain what the future holds for our city so long as the core of our community's leadership is represented in such symbols as Lovett and its first cousins.

DR. KING'S COMMENTS AT THE CATHEDRAL OF ST. PHILIP, ATLANTA ESCRU

On Saturday afternoon, June 4th, the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., paid a visit to the Cathedral of St. Philip in Atlanta to greet the Rev. Frs. Robert Hunter and Albert Dreisbach, then in their third day of fasting at the Cathedral to protest the use of the diocesan church for the Baccalaureate Services of the Lovett School. Following is a partial transcript of Dr. King's comments to the press at the door of St. Philip's after his conversation with the two priests.

DR. KING: "....This is a most significant witness for the Christian Church and for Christian men. Certainly when evil continues to exist it is the job of the minister, in line with the teachings of Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, to take a stand... ...this period of fasting and this witness will appeal to the hearts of those who have not yet been moved enough to end the segregation and the complete exclusion of Negroes in a church-related institution. It is quite interesting, I think, to mention that the public schools have had some form of integration for the last four years in Atlanta, and yet we find a church-related school still holding out and refusing to integrate. This is another example of the fact that the Church can be, if it is not careful, the tail-light instead of the headlight in our society; and it would be tragic, indeed, if the Church turns out to be the last bulwark of segregated power."

FR. HUNTER: "I would just like to say that I appreciate Dr. King coming out today, because this points out that this is not just a private thing or family affair.... ...what happens at this Cathedral has effect through the total community. We've also had many Roman Catholic priests and Protestant ministers who have been out to give their support. Dr. King's presence is a symbol that this has community impact and, indeed, national impact."

REPORTER: "Dr. King, you have a personal interest in this, don't you?"

DR. KING: "Yes, I do have a personal interest. In general my interest grows out of my deep ethical concern and my concern to see a relevant church. But, on the other hand my son applied to Lovett School a few years ago and was rejected. And naturally this rejection brought about a personal concern that's still there. This is one of the reasons we are so happy to see committed clergymen taking a stand on this very, very important issue."

REPORTER: "Dr. King, heretofore, you've always had the government, which has the control over the public schools...now how about the parochial schools...what sort of action can you see being taken there? Do you expect to go to the courts or anything?"

DR. KING: "Well, I don't think there is an expected move at this point in the courts. I don't know of any. I think it's going to take action like this...from persons within the Church, and the support that can be gained from persons of good will all over the country, to arouse the conscience of the Trustees of the Lovett School as well as the leaders of the Church in general. I have gone over the list of the names of the Trustees of this institution. It reads almost like a "Who's Who" list of Atlanta....."

RE: The Meredith March & Recent Developments

1. As of today there are at least two Episcopal priests on the march. The Rev. Brian Kelley of Boston arrived in Mississippi today and was expecting to participate in the return visit to Philadelphia, Mississippi. He joins the Rev. Robert Castle of Jersey City who has been down there all week.

2. I talked with Fr. Castle last night following the gassing of marchers in Canton. It was every bit as brutal as news reports suggest. Claims from the Federal government that local law enforcement officials have the situation in hand begin to sound ludicrous in the wake of last night's police-instigated violence. I suspect that we will begin to see something akin to the national indignation that followed the gassing at the Pettus Bridge in Selma last year. It may mean that demonstrations will continue beyond the Sunday finale in Jackson.

3. The Rev. Quinland Gordon of Executive Council and I will go to Jackson tomorrow to augment our all-too-small contingent of clergy. Fr. Castle said on the phone last night that he felt others would be needed, not only for the final rally on Sunday, but for continuing support of voter registration efforts. ESCRU Chapters would do well to stay abreast of developments through their civil rights coordinating group. Do not depend on communications from here to know whether you should activate to send others. We can't reach you in time. It will be well, too, to stay in touch with Fr. Gordon's office at Executive Council which, in turn, is in touch with the NCC Commission on Religion and Race office which has had staff in Mississippi (including ESCRU Vice-President Fr. James Breeden.)

4. I dispatched the following telegram last night to the President, Attorney General Katzenbach, and John Doar, the Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights: I HOPE THAT REPRESENTATIVES OF OUR ORGANIZATION WHO WILL BE IN PHILADELPHIA, MISSISSIPPI, TOMORROW AND SUBSEQUENTLY WITH THE MEREDITH MARCH MAY BE AFFORDED WHATEVER PROTECTION IS NECESSARY. ALSO WOULD APPRECIATE HEARING OUTCOME OF FEDERAL INVESTIGATION INTO MURDER OF OUR STAFF PERSON JONATHAN DANIELS LAST AUGUST. .... Obviously I was not asking only for the security of our men there, but of all involved, and by referring to Jon Daniels I meant to suggest that we had had some experience with the results of a lack of proper Federal involvement. I suggest that others in ESCRU write Mr. Doar and Mr. Katzenbach and inquire into the results of their investigation into the Daniels killing. Mr. Doar told me in February that the Justice Department was "conducting a thorough investigation, not yet completed" and that "no final conclusions have been reached." There is ample reason to believe that a Federal indictment should be sought in Jon's death, because of his involvement with voter registration efforts. Such is covered under the 1965 Voter bill. I am afraid, though, that it will take constant pressure to obtain a satisfactory follow-through. Efforts pursuant to this can indirectly have a salutary effect on Federal initiative in Mississippi now. I hope that a few of our Bishops and others who can write on impressive letterhead will communicate their concern, but a quantity of communications to persons at various levels will help.

5. The lack of Federal initiative relative to the Meredeth March is especially disturbing in view of the proximity of the bitterness and violence to Dr. King himself. I doubt that he has often been as close to danger before. We can little conceive of the repercussions that would attend harm done to him, having serious implications for countless tinderbox cities around the country and international relations as well. But, the demand for Federal intervention is as great when only one of the least of those who walk is set upon by a racist trooper or a Federal agent stands by while KKK types assault non-violent demonstrators as in Philadelphia earlier this week.

6. It was good to learn that $1000.00 is being sent by Executive Council via the NCC Commission to help with the expenses of the march. This is in line, I believe, with what other denominations are doing.

7. Finally, I trust that ESCRU Chapters and others are increasing their efforts to support passage of the new Civil Rights legislation as one avenue of responsible reaction to the crisis in Mississippi. The personal security sections are very vividly related to what is going on over there, but we must press for the title on Housing as well. Birmingham produced the 1964 Bill, and Selma the 1965 legislation. It is up to each one of us now whether we will see the completion of legislation needed to just open the way ahead for the possibility of what some believe can be a Great Society. There is little greatness in evidence now in Mississippi or in those Northern congressmen whose liberal image is suddenly falling apart in the face of the proposals for laws on Housing.

NEW DIRECTORS TO BE ELECTED

A ballot is enclosed with this newsletter for each member to use in voting for a member of ESCRU's national Board of Directors. Vote only in the contest for your Province. Ballots must be returned to the Chairman of the Nominating Committee in Houston, as indicated, by October 31st.

MILWAUKEE CHURCHMEN PICKET SEGREGATED CLUB

Shown below are members of Milwaukee ESCRU who joined with others in protesting the white-only policy of the Eagles Club in Milwaukee. Note also the excellent editorial in the September 25th copy of THE LIVING CHURCH on the responsibility of all Christians to examine the racial policies of clubs and fraternal orders to which they belong. // NEWS FROM OTHER CHAPTERS: Massachusetts has raised funds to help two former civil rights workers now studying at Tuskegee Institute. // Los Angeles heard Bishop C. Edward Crowther of Kimberly, South Africa, (a member of ESCRU), talk about the Church's task in his country. // Houston bringing pressure on St. John's School which is segregated. "Emergency Action Committee", trying to implement ESCRU Special Report "The Church & The Riots", met throughout the summer. // Richmond and Northern Virginia Chapters will merge. Latter helped two girls from Meade Parish in Alexandria attend diocesan camp. //Newark had planned a protest of anti-Jewish statements at dinner for King Faisal, but Churchman John Lindsay, the Mayor of New York, cancelled the affair. // San Diego members instrumental in cancellation of white Citizen's Council meeting. // Chicago members much involved in local scene through CCCO & SCLC. Planning late September theater benefit. // New Jersey assisting in protest of slum housing conditions & segregation in Camden public housing. // Cleveland encouraging action in matter of clergy placement. Mobilizing support for Fair Housing Council. ////////////////

BISHOP MYERS WILL PREACH AT ANNUAL MEETING

The Rt. Rev. C. Kilmer Myers, Bishop-elect of California and an ESCRU Director, will preach at the closing service for the 6th Annual Meeting of the Society which opens in New York City on November 10th. Other speakers were reported in the last Newsletter and are noted in the enclosed flyer. It promises to be one of the best-attended ESCRU conferences yet. Send in your registration now and make hotel reservations (or ask a friend in New York to put you up). Several chapters are making group travel plans.

FAILURE OF JUSTICE DEPARTMENT PROTESTED

On August 20th, 1966, one year from when Jonathan Daniels was murdered in Hayneville, Alabama, ESCRU issued a statement protesting inaction by Justice Department officials in their investigation into the shooting. Though signed by heads of 16 groups, including major civil rights organizations, it was ignored by the Washington press where it was released. Citing reasons why they could have brought charges against Daniels' assailant, the statement said: "It is time for... (Federal officials)..to stop merely collecting reports.... and get on with the business of acting vigorously on the basis of existing laws." ESCRU's Executive Director and the Chairman of Washington ESCRU led some 35 members in picketing the Department of Justice on the afternoon of August 20th.

SELMA: NOT ENTIRELY FORGOTTEN

Miss Corine Bell, a high school senior from Selma, spent the summer in San Diego at the home of ESCRU Director Mary Eunice Oliver, whose two sons, Darrel and Marc are shown here with their guest. Marc stayed at the Bell's home in Selma last summer when he worked with Jon Daniels. Still on the scene in the Selma area is the Rev. Francis Walter who heads up the Selma Interreligious Project, for which ESCRU handles receipts & disbursements. We'll send upon request a complete Program Report on S.I.P. Like the Delta Ministry in Mississippi it represents a pioneering aspect of the Church's ministry.

BLACK POWER REVIEWED

In a supplement to this Newsletter ESCRU's Executive Director reflects on the slogans and directions taken by some civil rights groups. This also receives much attention in the most recent issue of NEW SOUTH, a quarterly from the Southern Regional Council. Available from ESCRU for $1.00. An article on "Racism in Southern Africa & American Initiative" by John Morris also appears therein.

BRIEFLY NOTED

Former national President Joseph Pelham represented 5 shares of ESCRU-owned stock at the General Motors stockholders meeting & asked what GM was doing about racial practices at plants in South Africa. The reply amounted to nothing. Consideration is being given to further steps next year... ...Report on state of the Church in Alabama will be out soon....ESCRU-encouraged "Episcopalians for Effective Conventions" met at Seabury House to map plans for Seattle....Vice-President Fr. James P. Breeden reports follow-up to Montana statement by House of Bishops on clergy placement underway.... ESCRU staff helped mobilize Atlanta human relations agencies for common cause during recent riots.

FROM RECENT CORRESPONDENCE

Fr. Robert Carlson writes from Guyana in South America about that country's "explosive racial situation", but says: "The bright spot is that within the Church this has been overcome somewhat, and in many parishes....people of all 6 races worship together, associate together, intermarry..." An impoverished member sends $1.00 and says: "I hope you go on practicing what Gert Behanna calls 'tough love'. And don't mind too much when marshmellowed souled ladies think your 'tough love' is anger...." A couple from Michigan writes: "We have recently become disenchanted with the tack taken in integration; therefore, are not renewing our membership."

STAFF TRAVEL: Newly-arrived Director of Southern Field Service, Fr. David Nickerson, has already made visits to points in Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, and is participating in planning for a state-wide conference on Religion & Race in South Carolina. // ESCRU's Executive Director joined the Meredith March in Mississippi for the last 2 days, relieving Frs. Robert Castle & Brian Kelley who had walked much longer!

SERVICE FOR LOVETT AT CATHEDRAL PROTESTED IN JUNE

On the night of June 1st this past summer the clergy serving Atlanta's two predominantly Negro congregations entered the Cathedral of St. Philip on Peachtree Road to remain there, fasting, through the Baccalaureate on Sunday evening, June 5th, for the Lovett School. Cathedral authorities let them remain inside where they were visited by numerous Atlantans concerned that the school still enjoyed the use of St. Philip's, notwithstanding its well-known policy of segregation. On Saturday, Fr. Robert Hunter, Rector of St. Paul's, and Fr. Kim Dreisbach, supply priest at the time at the Church of the Nativity and on the ESCRU staff, were visited by the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., whose son was the first Negro applicant rejected by Lovett. Mrs. King was with her husband who is shown below talking with the press outside St. Philip's. Seventy-five Atlanta Churchmen stood in silent vigil outside during the service Sunday evening. The end of the Lovett saga came 3 months later.

Lovett School to Admit Negroes, Ending Dispute

By BILL SHIPP

The Episcopal-oriented Lovett School, center of a segregation dispute for the past three and a half years, has announced it will accept Negro students beginning in 1967.

In a letter last week to parents of children in the private school, James M. Sibley, chairman of the private school's board of trustess, said that "subject to limitations of space and facilities, those applications deemed best qualified . . . will be admitted without regard to race or religion." Thus ended the school's long standing policy of accepting only white students.

"Some three or four years ago, your trustees took a position which was controversial but one which the board believed at the time to be in the best interest of the school," Sibley wrote. "Neither then nor now have we allowed our personal views, opinions or prejudice to interfere in any way with the action that we considered wise for the school."

Neither Sibley nor headmaster Rual Stephens were available for comment Sunday on the announced end of segregation at Lovett.

The Rev. John B. Morris, executive director of the Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity (ESCRU), welcomed the news. The Rev. Mr. Morris' group, ESCRU, had led protests against the school's segregation policy.

"Their good faith will have to be demonstrated now in the extent to which integration is implemented in the school," the Rev. Mr. Morris said. "The acceptance of the principle of desegregation is the first step. It will require positive steps by Lovett now if qualified Negro students are to be attracted to the institution and provide it with an inclusiveness and wholeness which can best serve both the students and the community.

"ESCRU gladly lays aside its continuing protest of Lovett's former policy of segregation and joins with all persons of good will in hoping that we will see a speedy implementation of the new position," the Rev. Mr. Morris added.

Lovett's racial problems were touched off early in 1963 when the school refused to admit a child of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. Later the school turned down applications of two other Negro children.

The Episcopal Church then severed some ties with the school, although Lovett remained an Episcopal - oriented institution.

The school was picketed often after that. Two Episcopal ministers, the Rev. Robert B. Hunter and the Rev. Albert Dreisback Jr., fasted for five days in June in the Cathedral of St. Philip last June to protest the holding of Lovett's baccalaureate service in the church.

Protesters later announced plans "to focus" on the business ties of the school's trustees.

ORCHIDS to the Church & Race Fund which gave $1000. to the Meredith March and recently sent through a grant of $2500. toward the support of the Selma Inter-religious Project. Now let's work to have the Fund made a part of the Church's official budget, or at least that part which supports the NCC Commission on Religion & Race. Voluntary contributions are not sufficient to meet the needs, nor is this approach an adequate expression of the Church's commitment.

HERE AND THERE

N. Hamner Cobbs of Greensboro, Alabama, is a member of the Joint Commission on Ecumenical Relations of the General Convention and serves as one of the Episcopal Church's delegates to the General Assembly of the NCC. He also imagines himself an authority on Negroes, for in a recent talk to the Rotary Club in Birmingham he said: "The humor of the Southern Negro is being destroyed by the civil rights people." He went on to advise the Rotarians and Negroes to "...retain all this humor that you can...", and he added his feeling that "this racial unrest will pass over." /// "TWO VESTRIES CONDEMN ALL SOULS" stated the headline in a Washington, D. C. newspaper reporting that the parish which had cut its diocesan support due to civil rights & home rule efforts of Bishop Paul Moore was coming in for criticism from other parishes in the area, some of which are raising funds to offset the loss. /// A recording of Dr. Martin Luther King's address to the ESCRU Dinner at the 1964 General Convention has been banned by the Government of South Africa. About 1,200 copies of the record were made from a tape still available from the ESCRU office at $3.00 each. // // Columbia Records has issued an album on "Are You Running With Me, Jesus?", the book by Malcolm Boyd of the ESCRU staff now in its 7th printing. /// In a letter to some fellow Bishops, not members of ESCRU, Bishop Cadigan of Missouri said of the Society: "....We need this kind of group within the fellowship to serve as our unsettlers and as frontiersmen in our times." Several joined, bringing the total of Bishops in ESCRU to 51 paid-up. /// Presiding Bishop Hines sent a telegram on May 16th to Congressman Celler. It opened with: "As an individual I strongly support the general principles embodied in House Bill H.R. 14765 concerning civil rights." Said Bill died in the Senate on September 19th for lack of adequate support. /// Newly formed: Association of Episcopal Clergy, 370 Alvin Dr., Salinas, California 94102, to investigate, mediate, and - if necessary - protest abuses suffered by clergy in the Church. If interested, write for information. /// The American Committee on Africa and the National Student Christian Federation have joined in an effort to encourage New Yorkers to withdraw accounts from the Chase Manhattan and National City Banks to protest their involvement with racism in South Africa. /// Fernandina Beach's (Florida) two Episcopal congregations seem to be moving successfully toward a fully integrated status. (See ESCRU Newsletter, 10/28/65.) /// In a different Southern diocese, though, (not deep South at that), the Bishop has advised the Rector to go slow with integration which has been moving along just fine. /// Yes! The "backlash" is hurting us financially, too. $$$ needed!

FITTING PARSONS TO PLACES: (And the reverse!) Let us know if you need a Rector; or, if you are one & want to move, we invite a letter. Periodic requests come both ways and we are sometimes helpful in putting folks together - interracially & otherwise. For instance, an integrated parish in a northern urban area needs a Rector: predominantly Negro, on moderate to low side in Churchmanship, near N.Y.C.

LEGISLATION: Killed by Senators Dirkson & Russell, and not too much pushed by Mansfield, the 1966 Bill also died for lack of sufficient support from all of the groups which turned out so well in 1964 to back new legislation. /// The Diocese of Maryland has called for repeal of that state's laws against intermarriage - an effort worthy of attention for its symbolic value as well as practical effect.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 89th CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

Congressman Fraser Urges Forceful Action to Bring Majority Rule to Rhodesia

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Speaker, in recent months, a small clique in the United States has been spreading the fiction that the unilateral declaration of independence proclaimed in Rhodesia on November 11, 1965, is akin to that of July 4, 1776. This is fiction because the Rhodesian declaration was made by a small, privileged minority seeking to perpetuate its position against the threat of democracy in its own country. This clique, which calls itself the Friends of Rhodesian Independence, throws up a smokescreen of false issues and absurd assumptions. In a way this is useful, since to answer we have to return to fundamentals, to the nature of our society and our ideals, to what the United States stands for and wants to stand for in the contemporary world.

The rebellion of Ian Smith, the leader of the Rhodesian rebels, was designed to perpetuate the control of a small racial minority over the vast majority of Rhodesian citizens. He leads an effort by 6 percent of the population to permanently control the other 94 percent. It is a distortion of history to equate this purpose with the ideals which inspired the American Revolution and the principles for which we have been striving throughout our history.

The Smith regime seized power to prevent Britain from granting a role in government to all the people in Rhodesia as she did in all her other former African colonies; we rebelled against George III because England sought to maintain her colonial control over us. The Smith government favors rule by a racial minority through policies aimed at excluding virtually all Africans; our history has been a struggle to secure equal rights for all races. The Smith regime refuses to provide education above the primary school level for a meaningful number of Africans; we have tried to provide full public education to all citizens.

Racial injustice is no stranger to the United States. For centuries we enslaved Americans of African ancestry. We fought a Civil War to end this abominable practice, but we have moved too slowly to allow our Negro citizens full participation in our society. We have broken treaties with the Indians, and we have shunted them to reservations which are inadequate to support them.

The opponents of majority rule in Rhodesia point to these injustices and say that they justify American support for the minority in Rhodesia. But we are not proud of that part of our history, and it would be shameful for us to side with a group of people who desire only to emulate our mistakes. We have made great strides in racial equality and an aroused American conscience demands even more. We shun minority rule at home, and we cannot stand for this position abroad.

Ian Smith, the leader of the Rhodesian whites, is not George Washington reborn. Smith is defending a system which has existed in Rhodesia since at least 1923. The majority of the Rhodesian population oppose Ian Smith and proclaim the principle of majority rule. The Africans of Rhodesia say to the world that they know their own interests better than anyone else knows them, and that anyone who claims for himself a right to make decisions for other adults is by that very fact demonstrating his incapacity for responsibility in a democratic world.

THE REAL STRUGGLE FOR INDEPENDENCE IN RHODESIA

The real struggle for independence in Rhodesia today is led by African nationalists against a privileged minority. That this privileged minority was able to seize de facto power because of the errors of the colonial power, Great Britain, does not make its case any stronger. The African nationalists of Rhodesia are struggling for their freedom, however ineffectual their struggle may now seem. They should, one hopes, eventuall win. We should do whatever we can to aid this struggle and to applaud its victories.

But one can hear the defenders of Ian Smith now. Does the United States want another Congo? Is not independent Africa one long series of coups, rebellions, and anarchy? Thus, it is argued, the bad state of postindependence Africa should warn us off our hasty and ill-advised support for African nationalist movements. But these arguments misread the state of postindependence Africa. And even if they did not, it is never an argument against the possession of freedom that it may be misused.

The struggle for freedom is never simple or cut and dried. The struggle for independence in African countries has been going on since 1945. It is not yet over. Africa is still in the middle of its revolution, and it is absurd to demand that all be peace and gentility. We in the United States had to fight a second war for independence in 1812 and fought a bloody and unhappy civil war among ourselves some 85 years after our independence. We know that stability and peace are never achieved easily or rapidly.

RHODESIA IS PART OF A LARGER STRUGGLE

We cannot understand what is going on in Rhodesia today unless we remember that it is part of a larger complex—that of southern Africa. Ian Smith is fighting for the rights of the privileged minority not only in Rhodesia but in Angola and Mozambique, in South Africa and South-West Africa. If these friends of Ian Smith talk of turmoil in independent Africa, it is to make us forget oppression in minority-ruled southern Africa. If they boast of the small crumbs they have thrown the majority Africans in education, health, and living standards, it is to make us forget the enormous discrepancy between the style of life of the minority who have privilege and the lives of the majority who must work for them. If they talk of the defense of order, it is to make us forget that this status quo is not based on the consent of the governed.

VIETNAM AND RHODESIA

Another part of the smokescreen is the claim that Ian Smith and his supporters are alined with us on Vietnam and in other struggles against communism. But our Government has emphatically stated that it is fighting in Vietnam to assure the right of the people to rule themselves. Our Government rejects the claim that anyone has the right to dictate a government for the Vietnamese; we believe the people should make their own choice in free elections. To be consistent with our position in Vietnam, we must support these principles in Rhodesia as well. If Ian Smith is so sure that he represents the best interests of Rhodesia, let him present himself before an electorate where all adults can vote. He will not do it, because he would stand no chance of being elected.

The United States stands for self-determination. We have stood for this principle throughout our history. Let us make it very clear that we stand for it in Rhodesia, that we support majority rule there—not because the majority is always right, but because there is no system of government better than that of majority rule.

AMERICAN OBJECTIVES IN SOUTHERN AFRICA

If we do believe in self-determination in Rhodesia, what then should the United States do? We must do more than we have done hitherto. We have been equivocal. We have not, to be sure, supported the actions of Ian Smith. We have even sought in cautious ways to help him to disappear into the remote recesses of history where he will eventually be lodged. But neither have we clearly stated our positive objectives in the Rhodesian crisis.

The U.S. Government should state its commitment to the achievement of governments based on universal suffrage throughout southern Africa—in Rhodesia, to be sure, but also in Angola and Mozambique, in South Africa and South-West Africa. A statement by itself, of course, changes nothing. But it gives the world and ourselves a measure by which we can judge the adequacy of American policies in the immediate present. We can then ask about each decision in Washington or at the United Nations: Will that decision bring us closer to achieving governments based on universal suffrage throughout southern Africa?

Given a commitment to majority rule in southern Africa, our present position of support for the British boycott of the Ian Smith regime, while commendable, is inadequate. If we are the leader of the free world, we should take the initiative, something we have never previously done on issues involving southern Africa. If mandatory economic sanctions are needed to topple the Smith regime and bring self-determination, we should work to bring this about through the United Nations. We should not wait until we are pushed by the African and Asian nations and then try to achieve the weakest possible compromise.

WHAT HAPPENS WHEN SMITH FALLS?

The next question which is crucial and cannot be ignored is, What will Britain do should Ian Smith fall and power revert to the British Government? And in this House, the crucial question is, What does the U.S. Government think Britain should do? Because to replace Ian Smith with a slightly more flexible member of this same ruling minority group in Rhodesia does not bring us one whit closer to achieving a democratic society in Rhodesia. Britain must proclaim now its eagerness to negotiate with African nationalists the transfer of power within a reasonably short time. A government should be established based on universal suffrage and should receive its full independence. And the United States should press Britain to make clear this objective now.

Some may say, in a false shrewdness, that to do this would alienate some potential support for Britain's position among Rhodesian whites. But who can believe today, 6 months after the November 11 declaration, that such support exists in any meaningful amount? And in any case, what about the support of the overwhelming majority of the population which is not struggling for a return to British colonial rule, but for a government based on universal suffrage that would then receive its independence and full membership in the polity of nations?

DEMOCRACY VERSUS MINORITY RULE

If one wants to make a case against democracy, against majority rule, there are always arguments. The majority is never as educated, as rational, as foresighted as some of us would wish. But neither is the minority. Between the mistakes of the majority and inevitable self-serving decisions of even the most dedicated minority, those who believe in democracy must always choose the former. The decision in Rhodesia is today a simple one in the light of this fundamental principle. The majority of Rhodesians are not permitted to vote. It is said that many, if not most of them, are not civilized enough to vote. It is said that if they got the vote, they would use it in all sorts of ways that other people wouldn't like. Perhaps, but the majority is still the majority. Perhaps Ian Smith honestly believes he knows its interests best. That is irrelevant. The faith in democracy is based on the belief that all men are created equal. Equal in what? In native ability? In attained culture? Of course not. No, equal in the right to have a voice in the government.

Winston Churchill once said:

> No one pretends that democracy is perfect or all-wise. Indeed it has been said that democracy is the worst form of government except for all those other forms that have been tried from time to time.

AMERICA MUST SUPPORT FREEDOM

This is as true for Rhodesia as elsewhere. That is why our Government must make its position far clearer than it has done up to now. That is why we may not hide in the protective coat of British initiative. That is why we ought once again to take the risks of supporting the cause of freedom.

POWER: BLACK AND WHITE - SOME REFLECTIONS

John Morris

It isn't that I can add substantially to the controversy swirling around the slogan of "Black Power", but, rather, that it's part of my responsibility to ESCRU members to let you know how I felt about it when I woke up this morning. Concepts and moods which have been emerging for several years have now come fully on the scene, and - for better or worse - this is what I now feel about them. My mind could change, but the listening and pondering of several months leads me more firmly to the following observations. I know from conversations and correspondence that ESCRU members differ on the subject, so I do not presume to enunciate a position for the Society. This is something we will invariably do at the Annual Meeting, whether formally or by tacit consensus.

Let me put it in a nutshell right off, but invite your careful reading of the balance of what I have to say before you form conclusions; with a hope, also, that you will hear this in the context of ESCRU's seven-year history and the positions I have taken on related matters heretofore. Briefly put, I view the catapulting to prominence of "Black Power" - as I discern it in the main - as tragic historically, practically untenable, morally and theologically unacceptable, but probably inevitable and, possibly necessary.

Before I try to explain this, let's look at one side of the ledger - White Reaction to the slogan. I believe that white revulsion is chiefly induced by the too-universal factor of fear and suspicion of Negroes on the part of whites. Feeling that our culture is riddled through with racism, latent and otherwise, I seem to hear many white people saying in response to "Black Power": "Now my dislike of black people is justified."; or the moderate white seems to be saying: "How dare you threaten us.....after all we've done!" At best, the white moderate seems remorseful that he might not be able to retain the initiative in social change. Whatever the nuance, a lot of racism and/or paternalism is evident in the reaction that has come from white Americans to Black Power.

Let's also look squarely at the record of White Power over the years. Those three hundred years of brutal, dehumanizing slavery & segregation - still not done away - cannot be ignored in coming to grips with Black Power and its implications. See the whites in Grenada only yesterday stomping on small black children. Reflect on the meaning of the Senate's inability to take up the 1966 Civil Rights Bill. Listen to the white invectives in Chicago and Cicero, and feel the rain of bricks and bottles. Look at the Federal Government's refusal to take action in the case of white violence done Jonathan Daniels and Richard Morrisroe in Hayneville. It's really a miracle that the more violent exponents of Black Power have kept their peace so long. With the syndrome we've experienced since 1954 of "too little, too late, and too lily-white", recent developments were probably inevitable.

It isn't sufficient to come charging out as the Bishop of North Carolina did recently when he said that "...there is no place in this Church for the thinking of the Klan or the philosophy of Black Power.", thereby making an equal juxtaposition of the two. The fact of the matter is that there are white Churchmen in his diocese who espouse the thinking of the Klan - white supremacy - whom he has not previously sought to excommunicate. It's as if a little white racism is alright, but we sure aren't going to tolerate any Negro anger. Also, the record simply does not reveal that Black Power exponents have resorted to the same violence induldged in by whites for years.

All of this and more must be a part of any assessment of Black Power. It should not be necessary to recount such here, but in the shifting sands of present-day viewpoints, one must acknowledge that he hasn't forgotten these things before he then levels criticism at what seems to some to be the latest mark of a militant spirit.

We must also recognize the positive aspects of Black Power (which is all that some exponents of the new mood mean by the slogan), affirming their legitimacy and place in American traditions. Of course, Negroes must pull together in common cause for the obtainment of full economic, political and social freedom. Where this means an all-black effort, as in Lowndes County, Alabama, (home of the Black Panther party), so be it. Elsewhere, why shouldn't the political and buying power of black people be turned toward whatever will throw off the shackles of the old order? For many, this is what Black Power means. I respect it. I reject, however, the notion that a new concept has been introduced into "the movement", as if such leaders as Martin Luther King, Jr., and others, had not long seen such a necessity. The efforts by some to downgrade older leaders, as in the encouragement given small children in Canton, Mississippi, during the Meredith March to chant "Martin Luther Coon", etc., must be labeled as the worst in attempts at organizational aggrandizement.

In short, there is an aspect of the Black Power development which is consonant with the goals and aspirations of the Civil Rights Movement. But, there is another side to the slogan and the one which is fast becoming the hallmark of the position. It is represented in such assertions from Black Power exponents as: "Can you have power without violence?", "We've been shooting and cutting the wrong people."; "I am not opposed to violence."; "The answer is armed revolt against whites."; "....our black brothers engaged in acts of rebellion...", referring to riots; "Black Men, whitey's plan for you is death in Vietnam..."; "If you keep mixing, you won't have any black blood left."; "From now on we're using Black Power - muscle! We're going to tear this city up!"; "Non-violence is dead."; "...I want a little chaos."; "these flags don't represent you", as SCLC-provided American flags were retrieved from persons on the Meredith March by a SNCC worker; "Violence and non-violence are irrelevant."; "Get that White Jesus out of here", referring to a white poverty program worker in a Negro ghetto; "...white blood will flow..."; Etc., Etc. These statements are becoming the symbols of Black Power. They reflect the mood which I believe will increasingly be predominant and explanatory of Black Power activity. They are not the work of newspapermen trying to discredit an organization or new leader. No amount of care in the preparation of fund-raising materials will obscure this mood, nor does the fact that the mood is and has been present in growing sectors of the Negro community validate it as a legitimate part of the outlook of organizations due much credit for earlier leadership in the Civil Rights Movement. To recognize the mood and its causes is one thing. To encourage it, however necessary, perchance, it may be in the realization of group identity and in the ventilation of understandable feelings is another thing.

It is a dreadfully dangerous thing to provide white America with what is being interpreted as justification for white racism, and I believe certain charismatic leaders are doing just this. We used to label the counterpart of this in the white community 'demagoguery'. Whatever the justification, the same process can operate on the other side of the great racial gulf, and little people will take these pronouncements as sanction for their acts of violence. If this were South Africa, violence would be a viable alternative - even for Christians, I believe - in bringing about change. Here such continuing polarization can only result in the white community laying plans for the erection of gas chambers. It was a well-known prophet of our Household who once predicted such an outcome. Tragically, such is not now as incredible over the course of years as it seemed. This same prophet also suggested that white America (and he meant the nation as a whole) should realize that their best friend since George Washington was Martin Luther King, Jr. Recent developments have proved the truth and depth of this assertion.

Who is to blame that utter cynicism and despair have found their public spokesmen? White America and White Churchmen who have rocked along, never coming to grips with the racial crisis! And, Negro Churchmen, also ,who have left the impression that all was well because they personally had it made. Some say the crisis is now insoluble. I don't know. I also felt when I woke up this morning that there was this day's work to be done and that, for ESCRU, it had something to do with the wholeness of God's Church and its witness in the world. - September 27, 1966

TO ATLANTA MEMBERS & FRIENDS:

There has been more than a little news recently about unrest throughout the continent of Africa, and, more particularly, concerning the determination of the white minorities in countries to the south to further entrench their policies of apartheid, or segregation.

One of the few remaining voices of the Church raised in public protest against apartheid in the Republic of South Africa has been that of the Right Reverend C. Edward Crowther, Anglican Bishop of Kimberley & Kuruman. We last read about Bishop Crowther when Senator Robert Kennedy paid him a visit on his recent visit to South Africa. Before that he came under government pressure for his efforts to provide food supplies to Africans who were uprooted last Christmas by the government and moved to an area without adequate provisions or shelter. More recently he was denied permission to journey to another part of the country to be the keynote speaker at a Church Convocation.

Bishop Crowther, an American citizen now who was born in England and formerly taught law, is on tour in this country at the moment under the sponsorship of our sister organization, the Episcopal Churchmen for South Africa. Because I think it is important that we know more about the racial crisis in southern Africa, and its relationship to our own crisis and initiative abroad, I have asked Bishop Crowther if he would come to Atlanta. He has consented and is delaying his return to his diocese by one day so as to add us to his very full itinerary.

Accordingly, we are honored to be able to invite you to meet and hear Bishop Crowther, one of our most distinguished members, at a dinner in downtown Atlanta at Herren's Restaurant, 84 Luckie Street, on Tuesday evening, November 1st. The cost per person will be $3.50, inclusive of everything. The menu will include soup, pot roast, potatoes, salad, apple pie, etc. Space in the private dining room at Herren's is limited, so I suggest you make your reservation now, using the form below.

Bishop Crowther has not been granted a return visa to South Africa as of when I am writing this letter. We will be the last group he meets before embarking for his adopted home and the confrontation that will determine whether the government of South Africa will forcibly separate a Bishop from his people. I hope you will have the opportunity to meet him and hear what he has to say about the racial crisis both here and in South Africa, and the Church's role in it all. Dinner will be served at 8:00 P.M. For those who want to come early and talk with Bishop Crowther, Herren's will provide beverage service in the private dining room at 7:15 P.M. (not included in the dinner charge).

Faithfully,

John B. Morris

MEMORANDUM

October 6, 1966

TO: ESCRU Key Personnel & Leaders in Related Organizations

FROM: The Rev. John B. Morris, Executive Director, ESCRU

RE: Urgent Need for Messages to Ambassador Goldberg & Secretary Rusk

Enclosed is a copy of a memorandum I received today from the American Committee on Africa. It is self-explanatory, outlining why messages of concern to the U. S. Representative to the United Nations and to the Secretary of State are needed now with regard to how the United States will vote on the South-West Africa issue now before the world body.

There is not much time before the vote will be taken. Telegrams and Special Delivery letters are in order. In my opinion this is a critical test of just where our government stands with regard to racism in southern Africa; nor is it an overstatement, in my estimation, to suggest that the very future of the U.N. and race relations at the international level hangs in balance on this decision.

The principle of U.N. authority over the territory of South-West Africa, as opposed to continued South African trusteeship, must be established; and the United States must back this principle with a determination to put ourselves at the disposal of the United Nations in seeing that it is upheld.

I hope you will write or wire today. Also, because there is such little understanding or concern for this at the grass-roots, I hope you will see that others in your area, or in your constituency, are informed and asked to help.

The enclosed memorandum and other sources offer far more competent advice on the specifics of what is involved in the South-West Africa matter. If it seems strange, still, that I am writing in behalf of ESCRU to ask you involvement in this, I invite your reading of an article I wrote in the Summer issue of the Southern Regional Council's NEW SOUTH entitled: "Racism in Southern Africa and American Initiative". I try to deal with the rationale for civil rights organizations taking an active interest in apartheid. It may be obtained from SRC, 5 Forsyth St., N. W., Atlanta, Ga. 30303, at $1.00.

If you are not now on their mailing list, I suggest that you write the American Committee on Africa, send a contribution, and ask to be included on their mailing list to receive their periodical AFRICA TODAY and other such mailings as the enclosed.

I am quote aware that this memorandum goes out in a time when all the reverses suffered by civil rights advocates make concerns for apartheid in Africa seem even remoter and beyond our influence. Certainly, here in Georgia we have felt crushing blows politically of late. I am deeply involved here in various efforts aimed at the recovery of some sanity and rebuilding for the future. At the same time, I see the inter-relatedness of all this more and more, and especially as regards those points at which decisions by industry and the Federal Government concerning apartheid are at stake.

4th October 1966

Dear Friend:

We are enclosing a brief background statement on the South West Africa issue now being debated at the UN. This question together with the unilaterial declaration of independence by the white minority in Rhodesia, will be the basis for international initiatives to limit the power of South Africa. It is not expected that this General Assembly will deal with new approaches to the issue of apartheid within South Africa.

As is clear in the enclosed statement, we feel that the principle must be established by UN action that the UN has the right and the responsibility to terminate South Africa's administration of the Mandate in South West Africa. The means of implementing this action, is a most serious question. Implementation will take a period of time, undoubtedly. But the task cannot be started until the principle of UN control of the Mandate is clear.

We urge you to communicate with Secretary of State Rusk and UN Ambassador Goldberg, urging acceptance of the principle of UN control of the Mandate (as asked for in the Afro-Asian resolution) because South Africa has violated her "sacred trust of civilization". The resolution will be voted upon in a few days. Therefore immediate action is required.

Sincerely,

George M. Houser

George M. Houser
Executive Director

SOUTH WEST AFRICA

The Current Issue

With the opening of the 21st session of the UN General Assembly on Sept. 20th, one item was given priority status on the agenda - South West Africa. In an unprecendented action, debate began on this issue simultaneously with general statements by various delegations on the world situation. This is a mark of the importance of this issue. The basic question is whether South Africa will with impunity continue to exercise her racist policies over a growing area in southern Africa.

Some aspects of this issue are outlined in this memorandum.

Background

The Territory: Arid scrubland and semidesert stretching over an area the size of France and the United Kingdom combined; a land hemmed in between the Atlantic and the Kalahari Desert, between white supremist South Africa and Angola, Portugal's fat colony; a land where the scarcest commodities are water and people.

Apartheid People:	Whites	Blacks
	80,000	480,000

Colonized, exploited and decimated by the Germans until 1918, the Africans haven't done any better under the "sacred trust of civilization" (Mandate). The South Africans have settled the best land in the center of the country, and the Africans have been confined by law to the north and a few shabby reserves. A permit is required to come to the "white" central areas and if you're black, you only get a permit by offering your labor. As communications in the north are virtually non-existant and African agriculture has received no assistance, cash earnings are hard to come by. So the Africans come South, where they get paid one-tenth of what Europeans earn.

The African political parties have been outlawed; Africans cannot even vote for whites. Alleged political organizers or even witnesses can be imprisoned without charge for successive 180-day periods. Africans cannot own land in half the country. Africans must use separate facilities: inferior and scarce hospitals and schools and buses and trains and crowded living compounds.

The Resources and Capital: The extensive mineral deposits, the karakul sheep lands, the rich fishing grounds, are for white capital and white profits. Half the profits leave the country; less than 10% find their way to black areas through Government revenue and expenditure for social services. With self determination, equal opportunity and independence the Africans would have the highest per capita income of sub-Sahara Africa: $250 approximately (equivalent to mineral-rich Gabon).

THE MANDATE

"THE MANDATORY SHALL PROMOTE TO THE UTMOST THE MATERIAL AND MORAL WELL-BEING AND THE SOCIAL PROGRESS OF THE INHABITANTS OF THE TERRITORY." (Mandate Article of League of Nations)

The Mandate to administer South West Africa was given to South Africa in 1920 by the League of Nations. One party to the contract, which the United Nations inherited, has obviously failed its obligations. South Africa has not sent in reports on the territory to the UN and has impeded petitioners, who have wanted to present evidence against the administration. Moreover, South Africa has violated Article 1 (2) of the UN Charter regarding the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples. South Africa has flouted General Assembly resolution 1514 XV in failing to grant the people of South West Africa political independence after forty-six years of administration.

The International Court of Justice: The decision of July 18, 1966 was tragically mistaken. It was held that no country, however closely related its people to the victims of racial injustice in South Africa, whatever its concern for the sanctity of international agreements to which it is a party, has any legal interest in how South Africa governs its mandated territory of South West Africa. Effectively, this reverses the ruling of December 21, 1962, the minority opinion of that year becoming the majority opinion of 1966.

The Court's earlier advisory opinions are left untouched. In 1950, 1956 and 1962 it was shown that South Africa is responsible to the United Nations for its administration of South West Africa. However, the 1966 judgment appears to deny any effective judicial means of vindicating that responsibility.

The 21st General Assembly: A joint draft resolution has been introduced and cosponsored by most Afro-Asian states.

Operative paragraphs (4-7) of the resolution read as follows: (The General Assembly)

4. "Decides to take over the Mandate conferred upon His Britannic Majesty to be exercised on his behalf by the Government of the Union of South Africa and to assume direct responsibility for the administration of the Mandated Territory;

5. "Establishes a United Nations Administering Authority for South West Africa composed of ... States Members of the United Nations - to be immediately designated by the President of the General Assembly - to administer the Territory on behalf of the United Nations, with a view to preparing it for independence;

6. "Requests the Administering Authority to proceed immediately with its work in the Territory and to recommend to the General Assembly as soon as possible, and in any case not later than the twenty-second session of the General Assembly, a date for the independence of the Territory;

7. "Requests the Security Council to take the necessary effective measures to enable the Administering Authority to discharge its functions in accordance with the present resolution."

US POLICY

The International Court decision of July 18 preserves the status quo - the continued control of South West Africa by South Africa, extension of apartheid, virtual annexation of South West Africa into the Republic, etc.

The real issue is whether the international community, through the UN, will allow South Africa to continue to exercise its administrative authorities in South West Africa, or whether steps will be started for the UN to assume responsibility for the Mandate. Basically this is a political, not a legal issue.

South Africa does not recognize the right of the UN even to a supervisory role over the Mandate. Therefore, whether the UN assumes only a continued supervisory role (as was recognized by the advisory opinion of 1950), or takes over the administration of the Mandate, a direct confrontation with South Africa is inevitable.

After 16 years of efforts to find a conciliatory solution, half measures are fatuous. The United States must ensure through the United Nations that the people of South West Africa secure their inalienable right to self-determination, freedom and independence in accordance with the UN Charter.

The task of the United States is crystal clear. Democracy and freedom have been usurped in South West Africa. It is quite essential for the United States to support the resolution by which the powers of the Mandate revert to the UN. The United States must then demonstrate that the prospective UN Administering Authority will enter South West Africa and will enter with the active support of the United States.

It is not expected that this resolution if accepted by a UN majority will be implemented easily. A step-by-step course will undoubtedly be followed. But the principle of UN authority will be established and hopefully then, some step can be taken toward extending the provisions of the Charter even into a territory that has been dominated by South Africa for so long.

To carry out its program and work in 1966, ESCRU must depend on the same level of giving as last year (or better!) and find an additional $12,162.72.

Comments on the Budget:

In a year when many organizations concerned with race relations are anticipating they may have to cut back in their program, because of reduced receipts, ESCRU's Board of Directors has launched us on an imaginative and accelerated course in our service of the nation and the Church. It is a bold step, and a challenge we cannot turn away from. Seldom during the past ten years have our goals and the needs facing a divided people been more urgently linked together. Queries are heard on all sides: "Where do we go from here? What will the movement do now? How many riots will there be this year, and how much worse than Watts?" Perhaps more than ever before there is an opportunity for us to be heard and understood with regard to ultimate values and goals. So, it is a time to walk with determination into the unknown months ahead; not a time to reduce our efforts. With a continued good level of stewardship generally, and an increase in giving by those who are able, we should see our way through 1966 financially speaking. A budgetary increase of $12,162.72, over last year's income, will demand new sources, however. I ask your help in seeking and providing these sources.

HOW THE MEMBERSHIP LOOKS AT E.S.C.R.U.

Last summer the national office asked ESCRU members what they thought of the Society and its work, both at the national level and in terms of the local Chapter, where these exist. This is a report on how 434 members (out of a total membership of approximately 5000) look at ESCRU. The chart below indicates how they view national ESCRU, with a sampling of additional comments. The feelings of the 314 located where ESCRU has a Chapter are charted on the reverse side. Chapters may want to run their own survey to see if there has been any modification in feedback.

Selected Comments: Pro and Con

1. Your format and Newsletter are at last readable; good work!
2. (In reference to President Peabody's suggestion that college entrance boards should think twice before admitting graduates of the Lovett School) Furthering this sort of policy is in itself a form of discrimination.
3. National ESCRU is too quick to support other (and often questionable) civil rights groups.
4. I'd like to see ESCRU more active at the grass-roots level, working more through Church and parish channels. I think we have unwittingly separated ourselves from the very people for whom we want to show our love and concern.
5. My admiration and respect for National ESCRU, its staff and its work is unlimited.
6. The primary job of ESCRU is not to indulge in "me too" tactics in areas already in turmoil..., but rather to awaken our part of the Church to the fact that our theology compels us as Episcopalians to become involved in the "movement" through existing channels.
7. National ESCRU should lessen its focus on crisis and work toward long range plans of helpfulness.
8. ESCRU is always stimulating on the national level. I don't always agree with the positions taken, but am always glad to hear someone speak with a clear, loud voice on matters of conscience.
9. I am amazed at the amount and variety of National ESCRU activity with such limited staff and paucity of funds.
10. ESCRU is an essential thorn in the side of PECUSA officialdom.
11. National ESCRU is hardly known, easily forgotten.
12. ESCRU fails to gain enough publicity about itself and its principles between crises.
13. The majority of Episcopalians are unaware of ESCRU; it is rarely mentioned in diocesan newspapers, rarer, if ever, in parish bulletins.
14. I believe wholeheartedly in ESCRU, but I cringe when it speaks and acts as the self-righteous redeemer. We have all sinned, and only Christ redeems.
15. ESCRU sometimes gives the impression of a slight lack of Christian charity.
16. ESCRU is sometimes disrespectful towards the Church - thank God!!!
17. My only criticism...is that ESCRU is (a) sometimes not pragmatic enough and (b) it syphons Episcopalians away from the more secular and often more effective civil rights work.

THE EPISCOPAL SOCIETY FOR CULTURAL AND RACIAL UNITY

The Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity

STATEMENT OF PURPOSE

THE PURPOSE of this Society shall be to encourage men to respond positively to God's call for unity in the Church. The unity of God with man, and man with man, is made by God in Baptism and Holy Communion. We commit ourselves to establish total participation in the Church for all persons without regard to race, class, or national origin; to give mutual support to all who act in this ministry of reconciliation; and to express this concern at parish levels and in a more creative witness throughout the community at large.

IN FAITHFULNESS to Jesus Christ, Who values all men equally, and Who prayed that all might be One in Him, and in understanding of the essential unity of the Church, the Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity affirms the unity in His Body of all persons without any distinction as to race, color, national origin or class. In accord with the councils of the Church, we affirm that any form of segregation or separation based on such distinctions in either the Church or the general community is contrary to the will of Christ and must be resisted by His Church and its members.

WE CONFESS OUR FAILURE to seek steadfastly this unity of persons and we penitently admit to prejudices which may separate us from brothers. Praying daily that the Church may be rid of all divisions based on race, color, national origin or class, and that a more just social order be established, the members of the Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity will work toward this end within the Church and their communities as they are individually and corporately able. They constitute this Society as a sign of their commitment and as a means of resource to the Church, and they invite other Churchmen to join them in its objectives, which are to seek:

1. A recognition that our responsibility lies with all persons in a given geographical area and is concerned with drawing these persons into full fellowship through Baptism and Holy Communion within that one parish unit.

2. Mutual support amongst this society for all clergy and laity who, in seeking total participation in parish life for all, find themselves at odds with accepted social mores.

3. Increased acceptance and implementation of the principle that the Church is an inclusive fellowship which seeks out and welcomes all persons into the worship and parish life of any congregation without distinction as to race, color, national origin or class.

4. Elimination of criteria based on race, color, national origin or class for applicants to Church camps, conferences, schools, colleges, hospitals, or other institutions or agencies which the Church may operate or sponsor in any way.

5. Understanding of the prophetic role of the Church, both through corporate and individual effort, in seeking the elimination of racial and other prejudicial barriers in society, whether these be erected by governmental process or through custom.

6. That condition of harmony among peoples which is the benefit of a mutual recognition of the Lordship of Jesus Christ, so that brothers may dwell together in unity and see Him so lifted up that He will draw all men unto Him.

If you agree with this Statement, take your stand with over five thousand others and use the attached form to join. If there is a Chapter of the Society where you live, you will be informed about local activities. Whether you are active in a Chapter or not, your membership in ESCRU makes you part of a growing fellowship of Churchmen who are ready to move beyond words into the concrete implementation of these objectives. You must decide what you can do where you are.

Freedom City is.... an idea, not a single geographical site.

.... a "movement" in the sense that poor people are depending less on others for direction, while turning to their own resources -- existing and potential -- for new community life.

.... an attempt at a model of what freedom means: not a perfect city, but a community engaged in the process of self-discovery and self-determination.

.... a new approach to the problems of fear, poverty and discrimination in Mississippi. Through independent and cooperative action, poor Negroes are seeking their own solutions to their problems of food, housing, jobs, education and brotherhood.

.... not a plan for self-sufficiency, but for self-determination. Help from the outside is needed, but the decisions must come from within the community itself.

.... not an attempt at protective isolation, or an alternative to political realities. It is a base for the practice of democracy and the development of full citizenship, sufficient to contribute toward a new Mississippi.

What You Can Do Now

1. "Acres for Freedom" is a way of saying $400 will pay for an acre of land in Freedom City. ($200 will pay for half an acre, etc.)

2. As a start, the people have requested the government to furnish temporary housing and the means to build 100 low-cost permanent homes. Even if this grant comes through, it does not include the cost of land, or of a large community center building to house the educational, social and citizenship programs needed immediately. (A college or community might take this on as a project.)

3. A printer has offered to live and work in Freedom City, training apprentices and providing jobs, if we can supply a building with 2,000 square feet of space. With sufficient capital, he will start a statewide "freedom" newspaper.

4. The city urgently needs men with management, marketing and business skills to help start and run agricultural, industrial, retail and service enterprises.

5. A school bus, playground equipment, and money for trees and shrubs are also needed.

A New Community

For 100 years, America has paid little attention to the way black farm workers were exploited to make cotton-growing profitable.

The current refugee crisis -- in which some 30,000 Negro plantation tenants in the delta are made homeless by mechanization and reduced cotton allotments -- is only the newest manifestation of a long-time truth: "the American way of life" has no room for these people.

They live in shacks owned by the plantation boss, earning $6 or less each working day (for a median income of $456 a year). Over 90% of their homes are without running water. The state has no compulsory school laws, and no child labor laws. Although 2/3 of the people in the delta are Negroes, not one of them sits on a school board, a county board, a city council, a county crop-allotment committee or a welfare board.

The system has not only kept them in ignorance, poverty, fear and bad health, but has tried to make them incapable of breaking these bonds. Athird of the adults are illiterate; bad health and lack of incentive sap their ability to work; fear and inability to participate in decision-making dull the initiative.

For years, the only alternative for plantation people was to migrate north. More than 323,000 Negroes left Mississippi in the 1950's, encouraged by white Mississippians who saw this as the "solution" to a problem.

But the northern ghettoes have little more to offer than the plantation did. And Mississippi is "home" -- as much theirs as the whites'.

Freedom City is a creative alternative to the wretched living conditions, and to the terrible fact of being unwanted. It is a place where people can participate in determining their own future.

It is a response to those families who want to start a new life and build new communities in Mississippi.

FREEDOM CITY HAS BEGUN

On 400 acres of rich delta land in Washington County near Greenville, Mississippi, Freedom City has begun. The property has a few farm buildings, some equipment, and an increasing number of residents coming off the plantations.

Even before the land had been secured, 25 families -- 125 people -- had come to the Delta Ministry's Mount Beulah Center near Vicksburg. There, while studying literacy, citizenship, and other subjects which they chose themselves, they began planning the new community.

The spring months are and have been full with planning, planting crops, seeking funds, and encouraging industry to settle on the new site.

Nobody knows how much courage, cash, confusion and callouses are involved in this venture. But the people are ready to move ahead. They believe others share their faith, and will support their efforts.

South Africa... "beloved" country

BEHIND THE JAILINGS AND THE HUNGER outlined in this folder lies the system of apartheid. While the world generally moves away from racial distinctions, South Africa stands out as a flagrant exception. Even the fierce segregation movement in Mississippi and Alabama, carried on in defiance of the American nation, pales when set against the government-enforced APARTHEID of South Africa. Not since the days of Hitler has the world seen such cruelty codified into a legal system—victimizing more than thirteen million non-whites for the benefit of three million "Europeans." The South African Government advertises that its system is one of "separate development," not discrimination, but, leaving aside the cases of outright opponents of discrimination,

APARTHEID MEANS:

- One African baby in four dies before he is a year old (only one white baby in 37 dies the first year)
- An average African can expect to live less than 40 years (the average white reaches 70)
- Africans may not work, live, or travel where they please. Every man and woman must be able to produce a "Pass" on demand—

  About 1,000 people per day are convicted of violation of the Pass Laws.

To understand the courage of those we shall help through AFRICA DEFENSE AND AID FUND, we must keep in mind the vicious system of racism against which they struggle.

AFRICAN SLUM
Scenes like this are still common, even though new African Townships are being built as part of the attempt to give a new facade to the practice of segregation.

AND A YARD TO PLAY IN
Regular playgrounds for African children are rare.

FREE FARM WORKERS
Bars on the window of their living quarters—as well as Pass Laws and Curfew—underscore the limits of "Freedom" for "free" Africans.

aid victims of South Africa's racism

"600 families (of jailed political prisoners) with over 2,000 children, and at the moment we can do no more than pay their rent and give a pitifully small supply of powdered milk, etc. to the children."

—Letter from Port Elizabeth, early 1965

South Africans fighting racism need HELP!

THE FAMILIES OF SOUTH AFRICA'S HUMAN RIGHTS WORKERS SUFFER . . .

CASE: In November, 1964, three African labor leaders, Mini, Nkaba and Khayinga, were executed, leaving three widows and 13 children. "The children are in an absolutely desperate position. They have no decent clothing and are now without schooling." (Letter from South Africa)

In this case, $1,400 was raised in the U.S. by the Africa Defense and Aid Fund of the American Committee on Africa—enough to help for a few months.

CASE: When Jackson Mati was sent to jail for seven years, he left his six motherless children with their 70-year-old grandmother (her pension: $3.55 per month). Because there are so many similar cases, a sympathetic relief committee has had only powdered milk and soup to give her for the children.

There is no need to multiply the cases. All over South Africa, families are deprived of the breadwinner when he is jailed for opposing government-enforced racial discrimination. Because thousands are in jail at any given time, the needs for relief are overwhelming.

More than relief is needed, however. Adequate legal defense for those charged is even more important.

A good defense in court can bring acquittal. Failing that, it may mean a shorter sentence. In either case, the person charged—and his family—benefits. And we, on the outside, have done what we can to mitigate the injustices suffered under an unjust system.

CASE: James Chirwa, charged with "leaving the country for military training," was tried in secret, convicted, and given a long sentence. When the case came to light and an attorney appeared for Mr. Chirwa on appeal, his sentence was reduced by 8 years.

As South Africa has stepped up repression, an intricate pattern of apartheid law has evolved. Words used to title laws may not mean what they mean in other parts of the world. Thus, a person can be charged under the "Suppression of Communism Act" even though he is not, and never has been, connected with any international Communist movement. And a person can be charged with "Sabotage" even though he has only painted a sign opposing discrimination (see picture).

BANNING: African Nationalist organizations have been made illegal: they have been "banned." When applied to an individual, banning means an order restricting him in specified ways. To break the ban is to risk jail.

CASE: JOHN MOLEFE, released after almost three months detention without charge, was served with banning orders in late 1963. The orders contained a clause forbidding this man in his sixties from entering factory premises. Not understanding that he was being banned from his job as a laborer, he returned to the factory, was arrested, and jailed. Soon after he came out of jail pending appeal, he died. Subsequently, his wife was served with banning orders!

CASE: MRS. SCHLACTER'S banning order required her to report regularly at the police station. She forgot to report just once. Sentence: one year in jail, with 11 months suspended. On appeal, actual imprisonment was cut to seven days. Should she forget to report once again, she will be forced to abandon her two school children and serve the remaining 51 weeks.

CONSPIRACY TO COMMIT SABOTAGE: Whites and Indians as well as Africans and Coloureds are frequently so charged:

CASE: RAYMOND EISENSTEIN, 27 years old, studying for an LL.B. and working as a reporter for the Rand Daily Mail (Johannesburg) at the time of his arrest. Born in the Warsaw ghetto, he was smuggled out and lived in hiding as a baby and a small boy. At his trial, his mother gave evidence in mitigation, saying that the Nazi terror had so affected him that he could not help being an opponent of injustice. Sentence: 7 years imprisonment.

CASE: LALOO CHIBA, 34-year-old Indian truck-driver, married with three children. Convicted of conspiring with one other Indian, one African, and two whites to overthrow the state, he is now in jail for 18 years.

He alleged that, when detained earlier on a charge of which he was acquitted, he was beaten on the soles of his feet until he could barely walk; he was suspended upside down in a sack; and he was tortured with electric shocks. Finally, he was so savagely beaten that he is permanently deaf in one ear.

AND REFUGEES . . .

After years of struggle, arrests and threats of arrest, many flee South Africa. We must help these too—primarily by providing transport help from Bechuanaland northward to the independent African states.

the need

- for legal defense of those who fight for human rights
- for the families they leave when jailed or executed
- for those who flee their homeland because of injustice is desperate!

As the South African Government tightens the screws on all opposition—and fear grows in the land—outside financial support becomes vital.

We Americans can express our unity with the South African struggle by giving to AFRICA DEFENSE AND AID FUND of the American Committee on Africa

As Americans, ourselves involved in the struggle for interracial justice in the United States, we cannot afford to be less than generous to our allies in South Africa.

Klan and John Birch Society Reported Gaining in South

EXTREMISM

By TOM DUNKIN

Membership in and influence of the Ku Klux Klan and the John Birch Society are on the increase in the South, Theodore Freedman, southern director of the Anti-Defamation League, reports.

The House Un-American Activities subcommittee's expose of the klan "has not served to alienate those who would identify with the klan," Mr. Freedman told a joint meeting of Atlanta Lodge, B'nai B'rith Women and Gate City Lodge 144, B'nai B'rith.

The John Birch Society, "the radical right," has increased in the Atlanta area during the last year from 14 to more than 70 groups. Birmingham has 100 "John Birch Society cells in existence," Mr. Freedman declared.

Describing the John Birch Society as an organization which seeks to promote distrust and alienation of "those institutions which we have cherished," Mr. Freedman said that if opinion is created that the president, secretary of state and supreme court are disloyal, "you have sown the seeds of anarchy."

A CONNECTION between the John Birch Society and the klan has been noted, with one Birch official in Atlanta having been active in training "the paramilitary organization, the Minutemen" and serving as a speaker before klan groups, Mr. Freedman asserted.

The "radical right's greatest effort" since defeat in the last election will be on the local level, "to build candidates" for later races for higher office, Mr. Freedman said.

He foresees future candidates for Georgia state offices and Congress who will campaign with the endorsement of the John Birch Society, Mr. Freedman added.

The society, Mr. Freedman said, "is trying to fill the vacuum" due to failure of the White Citizens Councils in the South, and the South "has become a fertile area in recent years" for the society. "I can name you cities in Georgia where the mayor and chief of police are John Birch Society members," Mr. Freedman said. He did not name them.

QUESTIONED as to whether "the radical left" had been noted in the same Southern area, Mr. Freedman said there is "evidence of some inclination" toward the radical, or "New Left" in some civil rights and peace movements.

Elaborating upon extremism in the South, Mr. Freedman said "the mood of the South is not to be found in Atlanta, Houston, Birmingham or New Orleans. You can do better examining the rural areas, where violence and extremism remain the order of the day, countenanced if not openly supported by the white power structure." These events, "in turn, affect Atlanta, Birmingham, etc.," Mr. Freedman added.

Birch Society's TACT Will Step Up Its Fight Against Rights Activities

Ark. Gazette 2/26/66

By ERNEST DUMAS
Of the Gazette Staff

The John Birch Society is stepping up its work against civil rights activities in Arkansas through local groups called TACT—Truth About Civil Turmoil.

Several TACT committees have been formed in Arkansas in recent months, it was disclosed Friday at a news conference at Hotel Marion conducted by Rex Westerfield of Dallas, the regional public relations manager of the Society.

Westerfield was in the city to announce that the Society was expanding its work in Arkansas and the Southwest. With him was Franklin M. Childs of North Little Rock, a former Salt Lake City man who became full-time co-ordinator of Birch work in Arkansas last fall.

The TACT committees have been forming since last summer. A Washington Post reporter referred to TACT last month as a nationwide campaign against the civil rights movement. The Post article said the committees were front groups for the Birch Society and were directed by the Society's Western headquarters.

Westerfield said that Birch Society members usually were instrumental in starting the committees but that others were brought into them. He said the committees distributed books and other publications on the civil rights movement.

—Staff Photo
REX WESTERFIELD

He said that about 1,500 TACT committees were working in the country now. He did not know if any were operating in Arkansas but Childs said several were. He did not say where they were formed.

Aims to Create Understanding

TACT's efforts are directed at creating understanding between the races, Westerfield said. This also is the Birch Society's overall policy on civil rights, he said.

Westerfield insisted Friday that the Birch Society eschewed racism of any kind and that, in fact, it cancelled the membership of anyone found to be a member of the Ku Klux Klan or other racist groups.

He was asked about Dr. Medford Evans of Jackson, Miss., a leading spokesman of the White Citizens Council, who frequently writes for American Opinion, the Birch magazine. Westerfield said he did not know that Evans had any connections with racist groups. His chief asset to the Birch Society is his knowledge of atomic energy security problems, he said.

Westerfield said that the Birch Society was chiefly responsibile for the fact that there have been no major racial disturbances since the riots in the Watts section of Los Angeles last summer.

The work has included circulation of books dealing with civil rights and a speakers bureau that includes nine Negroes. They have cautioned against going to the streets with grievances, he said.

be opened at Little Rock. A book warehouse is being opened at Dallas, he said. A Fort Smith bookstore distributes Birch Society literature but it is privately owned.

Westerfield, 37, told reporters that he was a graduate of Harding College at Searcy. He said he wanted to visit the school during his Arkansas stay.

He took a crack at Senator J. William Fulbright for his remarks on the Vietnam war. He said it was tragic that a senator would suggest that you could compromise with Communists, "that we should consider these Communists as moral people."

He would not say that Fulbright was guilty of treason but he said that "it borders on it—that's pretty clear."

A reporter asked Westerfield if he had any idea how many Communists were in the United States. Like the membership in the Birch Society, the number is immaterial because three dedicated Communists can control almost any organization, he said.

Does this mean that three Birch Society members also could control any group?

"It does, but we don't work it that way," Westerfield said.

Negro Membership Is Increasing

This kind of activity has increased Birch Society membership among Negroes. Now, Negroes make up about 2 per cent of the national membership of the Society, he said.

While denying racist tendencies in the Society, Westerfield said that the Communists "unquestionably" were behind the civil rights movement in America. A number of books have documented this, he said.

In the Birch Society's January Bulletin, Robert H. W. Welch, the head of the Birch Society, said that civil rights disturbances had abated but he warned that others would begin because "you can be sure that the Communists behind the 'Civil Rights' fraud are not going meekly to drop, for long, so vitally important a part of their total strategy of subversion."

Westerfield said that the Birch Society was growing in Arkansas and the Southwest but he said he had no idea how many members or chapters the state had. He said large cities such as Little Rock had six or seven sections, each with a section leader, with a number of chapters beneath them. He said he did not know and that Childs was not allowed to say how many sections were in the Little Rock area.

Westerfield and Childs agreed, however, that every town of more than 3,000 had a chapter.

He said that eventually a Birch Society bookstore would

Mohammad Defends Clay, Lashes Out at Dr. King

CHICAGO, Feb. 26 (UPI) — Elijah Muhammad, wispy white-hating leader of the Black Muslim sect, fiercely defended his disciple, heavyweight champion Cassius Clay, Saturday for balking at induction into the Army.

Clay, wearing the insignia of the Muslims, was among the crowd of shouting supporters as Muhammad delivered a meandering, two-hour diatribe to the annual convention of his Negro supremacist sect.

The 69-year-old "messenger of Allah" also told his followers that Americans are rejecting peace in Viet Nam and that Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. is a lover of the white man . . ." "The white man's black man."

ONLY FRIDAY, Clay refused to apologize to the Illinois Athletic Commission for bitterly protesting his reclassification from 1Y to 1A in the draft. Clay had said "I ain't got no quarrell with the Viet Cong" and declared he would fight no wars "unless they are declared by Allah."

Minutes after Clay's refusal to say "I'm sorry," the Illinois attorney general declared the March 29 championship fight scheduled in Chicago between Clay and Ernie Terrell is illegal as now licensed.

Muhammad, apparently addressing himself to the white community in defense of Clay, said "you made him a fool. You classified him as unfit and then you call him.

"You tell him that if he won't go to Viet Nam he can't fight and make money. This is awful. This is a trial."

"You say the Negro should go to Viet Nam," Muhammad said, "but you let your sons stay here in colleges and universities."

Muhammad referred to Clay by his Muslim name, Muhammad Ali, and to Joe Louis, the former heavyweight champion.

"You are robbing him (Clay) like you did Joe Louis," Muhammad said. "Louis ate at my house. He is walking around like a bum — that's what he is. I could have cried.

"You want to make a bum out of Muhammad Ali, but you won't if he sticks with Elijah."

The estimated crowd of 2,000 Muslims who gathered for the sect's annual "Savior's Day" convention filled only one-fifth of the cavernous Chicago Coliseum.

AS ALWAYS at such gatherings, burly "Fruit of Islam" guards searched everyone entering the hall, giving special attention to white news reporters. When an integrated group of Methodists arrived to observe the meeting, the Negroes were admitted and the white persons were turned away.

The promoters of Clay's Chicago fight had said he would not attend the convention. But Clay was there, proudly wearing "Fruit of Islam" identification. His spiritual leader indicated he had as scant respect for the United States cause in Viet Nam as his disciple.

"There are no agreements among government heads," Muhammad said. "The President goes one way and the vice president goes somewhere else. These people are confused. These people are rejecting peace.

"They (the Viet Cong) will fight you 20 years. Americans don't want to fight 20 months."

SHELTON INDICTED WITH SIX OTHERS

3/4/66

Klansmen Face Year in Jail in Contempt of Congress

By JOHN HERBERS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 3 — Imperial Wizard Robert M. Shelton Jr. and six of his top leaders in the United Klans of America, Inc., were indicted today on charges of contempt of Congress.

A Federal grand jury of the District of Columbia returned the indictments that accused the Klansmen of contempt for their refusal to produce Klan records subpoenaed by the House Committee on Un-American Activities.

United States attorney David G. Bress said the defendants would be arraigned here March 11, when a date for the trial and the amount of bond will be set. He said no arrests were necessary under the charge, a misdemeanor that calls for a maximum punishment of one year in jail and $1,000 fine.

The klansmen will be entitled to trial by jury in District Court.

Charged with Shelton were James R. Jones, 36 years old, Grand Draton or Chief Leader of North Carolina; Robert E. Scoggin, 43, Grand Dragon of South Carolina; Calvin F. Craig, Grand Dragon of Georgia; Marshall R. Korengay, 37, Grand Dragon of Virginia; George F. Dorsett, 48, Greensboro, N. C., Imperial Kludd or National Chaplain and a paid organizer for the Klan and Robert Hudgins, 37, Raleigh, N. C., Imperial Klirapp or National Secretary.

CITED FOR CONTEMPT: Robert M. Shelton Jr., the head of the United Klans of America, Inc., was charged by a Federal grand jury with contempt of Congress.

Shelton, 36, reached at his national headquarters in Tuscaloosa, Ala., was fighting mad.

"It's another direct result of the political influence of the Administration, namely L. B. J.," he said.

President Johnson called for a Congressional investigation of the Klan last year.

"It's popular in this country to be a pinko or a political prostitute," he said, "but not to stand up and be a patriotic American."

Shelton said he would fight the charge "all the way to the Supreme Court."

The indictments grew out of the House Committee's year-long investigation, which ended last week. All the defendants and most other officials of the United Klans invoked their constitutional right not to testify about the Klan and refused to produce records ordered by the committee on the ground that this, too, would constitute self-incrimination.

All the defendants and most other officials of the United Klans invoked their constitutional right not to testify about the Klan and refused to produce records ordered by the committee on the ground that this, too, would constitute self-incrimination.

Shelton's organization is by far the largest of a dozen Klan groups that the committee has said were responsible for much of the racial violence in the South.

The House, acting on a recommendation of the committee, voted contempt citations against the seven Klan leaders Feb. 2. The vote was 344 to [illegible]. The Justice Department then took the matter before a grand jury.

The committee is considering the possibility of contempt citations against other Klansmen who refused to produce records and perjury indictments against three or four Klan members whose testimony about alleged plots of violence was contradicted by committee witnesses.

The House action was based on a Supreme Court decision of 1960, McPhaul vs. United States.

In that case, the court held by 5 to 4 that an official of the Civil Rights Commission which had been declared subversive by the Attorney General, was in contempt for not having produced records of his organization in response to a subpoena by the Un-American Activities Committee. However, only a fraction of the contempt of Congress citations have been upheld by the courtw.

In refusing to produce the records, the Klansmen acted on the advice of their lawyer, Lester V. Chalmers Jr. of Raleigh, who was retained by Shelton for the Klan hearings.

Shelton has charged the committee and the House with discrimination against the Klansmen. He noted that contempt citations were also recommended on the same day against three uncooperative witnesses in a Chicago anti-Communist hearing last spring.

More than 100 law professors have opposed the contempt action against both the Klansmen and the Chicago witnesses on the ground that the committee's procedures are unconstitutional.

Blast Rocks Clubs Called a Red Front

Dubois Executive Believes 30 Sticks of TNT Planted

SAN FRANCISCO (UPI)—An explosion, believed to have been caused by a massive charge of dynamite, ripped the national headquarters of the W. E. Dubois clubs in the pre-dawn hours Sunday.

The two-story frame building was unoccupied at the time, and there were no casualties.

The blast occurred just two days after the Justice department had labeled the organization a Communist front and demanded that it be ordered to register as such.

Terence Hallinan, national executive secretary of the clubs, said he was "convinced beyond a doubt" that the explosion was deliberately set. "It was caused by about 30 to 40 sticks of dynamite," he said.

"The Viet Nam war in general, and (Atty. Gen. Nicholas de B.) Katzenbach's charges in particular, created the environment for this act," the visibly shaken Hallinan said. "The shocking thing is that it happened in a city as liberal as San Francisco."

Hallinan said the national headquarters would be moved to Chicago in May, and the clubs would operate out of a temporary office here until then.

"The move has nothing to do with the explosion," he said. "When we started we were a west coast organization. Now, our main base is in the Midwest and we're just too far away."

Authorities at first declined to say specifically that the explosion was the work of a bomber, but arson squad inspector Ernest Capper said there was a heavy smell of "gunpowder" in the area when he arrived. Utility company inspectors said the blast was not caused by a gas leak.

The structure was hollowed by the explosion, and a large section of the front of the building was blown out. The street and nearby rooftops were littered with debris, trolley lines were blown down, and windows were shattered over a one-block area.

Several residents of the neighborhood reported they heard a series of explosions, a loud blast followed by two lesser ones.

"I thought we were being bombed," said Mrs. Willie Mae Jordan, who lives across the street from the headquarters. "I thought the Viet Nam war was coming here."

Inspector Joseph Lucas of the arson squad said it appeared that the blast occurred under the stairs of the front porch. He said the fire department had asked an Army bomb disposal unit to investigate.

Are DuBois Clubs a Danger?

EXTREMISM NYT 3/13/66

By FRED GRAHAM

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 12 — Happiness is being called a Communist by Nicholas de B. Katzenbach.

At least, that was the impression given this week by Patrick Hallinan, national counsel for the W. E. B. Du Bois Clubs of America. The San Francisco lawyer was brimming with youthful good spirits as he explained in a telephone interview the effect of the Attorney General's designation of the campus-oriented DuBois group as a Communist-front organization.

"We are pretty close to doubling our membership since Katzenbach went after us—especially on the campuses," Mr. Hallinan said.

"He doesn't understand young people today—you try to intimidate them and keep them from speaking out about the Vietnam war and they just become more determined to be heard.

"These kids who are in our group have been steeled by the civil rights movement. And they've grown up hearing that Robert Welch called President Eisenhower a Communist. The 'Communist' label just doesn't scare them."

Upon an examination of the organization as a whole, it is surprising that anyone bothered to label it at all.

The organization is named for W. E. B. DuBois, a prominent American Negro historian and sociologist who became a member of the Communist party at the age of 93, in 1961, and died two years later as an expatriate in Ghana. According to Mr. Hallinan's figures, the organization's membership is still below 5,000 dues-paying ($1 per year) members. Most of the 36 clubs are reportedly located near campuses, primarily in New York, California, Wisconsin and Illinois.

The members tend to be teenagers, and one turned out to be only 14 when New York police arrested a carload involved in a fracas with a red-baiting group last Sunday.

Prior to last week's action by the Attorney General—a request that the Subversive Activities Control Board order the group to register as a Communist front—the DuBois Clubs had been obscure, even among protest groups. They were overshadowed by larger and more militant groups during the mass anti-Vietnam demonstrations last fall. They would have been unknown to the public but for F.B.I. Director J. Edgar Hoover's repeated blasts at them during the past year.

One well-informed observer put it this way: "Those DuBois guys were considered squares by the hard-nose radicals until the Government went after them, because they always followed the Russian line. That's considered reactionary by the people who are really militant. Now the DuBois club has status. Why did the Government do it? It's crazy."

Justice Department officials are at a disadvantage because they can't engage in a rough-and-tumble discussion of their motives. But soundings within the Government this week turned up several leads.

Mr. Hoover's public campaign against the DuBois Society has had Mr. Katzenbach on the spot for some months, because the law says he "shall" bring proceedings whenever he has reason to believe a group is a Communist front. While it appeared to many that his timing suggested a move against the group's anti-Vietnam stand, in fact he may have picked what appeared to him to be the least sensitive time to perform an unpleasant duty.

There is no question that Mr. Hoover considers the DuBois clubs a serious threat to the nation's security. His agents within the American Communist party tipped him off in the late 1950's that efforts would be made to form a "front" group to recruit college students for membership in the party.

When a group called the Advance and Burning Issues Youth Organization was formed, the Justice Department moved in 1963 to cite it as a Communist-front organization. Under the glare of this publicity, it quickly collapsed.

This affords a good insight into the Government's present motives. Despite claims by leftists that official "persecution" helps their cause, anti-subversive officials have found, in fact, that when a group is branded a Communist front, membership falls off and it tends to wither. Convinced as they are that the DuBois clubs' anti-Vietnam protests are a reflection of Moscow's policy, the Government officials used the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950, for the purpose it was intended to serve—to frustrate the use of an unknowing American group for such a purpose.

Justice Department officials point out that 22 organizations have been found to be "Communist-front" groups by the board, and that all but one are now defunct. People don't like to be used by the Communist party and care even less about belonging to a known "front" group, they say.

DUBOIS VS. THE BOYS

The one clear loser in the DuBois Club controversy so far has been the Boys Club of America, a group that provides recreation, guidance and handicraft instruction for its nationwide membership of 750,000 boys, 7 to 17. After radio and television reports on the DuBois (pronounced doo-BOYS) affair, Boys Clubs over the country were showered with abuse by listeners who had confused the two organizations, and a spokesman expressed fear of a falling-off in public donations.

The Boys Clubs' national chairman, former Vice President Richard M. Nixon, blamed the mix-up partly on the Communists. The DuBois Clubs, he said, "are not unaware of the confusion," which he called "an almost classic example of Communist deception and duplicity."

THE BOMBERS: Violence aimed at the Du Bois clubs following charges that the group is a Communist front included the bombing of their San Francisco office last week.

McGee Forecasts Record Onslaught in Fall Voting

NYT 3/15/66

By DONALD JANSON

Special to The New York Times

DENVER, March 14—Senator Gale W. McGee forecast today that this year's election campaigns would produce "the largest and best-financed right-wing extremist assault on the sensibilities of the voters in American history."

The Wyoming Democrat said unsuccessful support of Barry Goldwater's Presidential candidacy in 1964 had failed to break the back of the right-wing's drive for political influence.

Rather, he told an opening session of the National Farmers Union Convention, it persuaded the movement that the route to success was "through its own devices" rather than through an established political party.

Mr. McGee, a leading foe of right-wing extremism, noted that the John Birch Society recently announced a program to establish "cells" in 325 Congressional districts and spend $12-million to promote its aims this year.

He said "good times" were helping to make this possible.

"We might as well adjust ourselves to a long siege of right-wing agitation and to a long life for the John Birch Society," he asserted.

Local Contests

Senator McGee foresaw election to Congress in the fall of only "two or three" ultra-conservatives.

But the movement's political efforts, he elaborated at a news conference, are likely to make much greater inroads in local contests.

By electing mayors, Parent Teacher Association officers and school board members, he said, the ultra-conservatives will be laying the groundwork for effective long-range activity.

"We must watch for the proliferation of shady front groups even now under way," he told some 3,000 farmers and farm wives at the organization's 64th annual convention in the Denver Hilton Hotel.

He cited, as an example, the Denver Committee to Improve Racial Relations, a new group that will hold an all-day "civil rights seminar" here Saturday.

Invitations contain no reference to the Birch Society, but investigation by The Denver Post determined that the committee had been formed by the Society and that its four speakers would be provided by the Society's American Opinion Speakers Bureau.

Joint Statement Issued

Asked how the committee intended to improve racial relations in Denver, Donald H. Kennedy, regional coordinator for the Birch Society here, said:

"By telling about the Communist infiltration into the civil rights movement."

The Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, the Denver Commission on Community Relations, the Colorado Civil Rights Commission, the Denver Branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Denver Chapter of the Congress of Racial Equality and the Latin-American Research and Service Agency here issued a joint statement denouncing the new group.

"The John Birch Society is seeking to exploit the nation's racial tensions for its own propaganda and recruitment purposes and for its deeper political goals," they said.

They called the "seminar" a "preliminary" to right-wing efforts to influence this year's Congressional elections.

Jersey Klan Plans Cross-Burning Rally on May 23

By RONALD SULLIVAN

Special to The New York Times

TRENTON, April 12 — The leader of the New Jersey Ku Klux Klan announced today that the organization was planning its first big, cross-burning rally since the late nineteen-twenties, when klansmen were a power in the state.

Frank W. Rotella Jr., the klan's king kleagle and a dismissed New York City welfare worker, made collect calls to newspapers to report that the rally would be on a farm outside of Bridgeton in South Jersey on May 23. "This will be the first of many such rallies in the state," he said.

Rotella, a 28-year-old graduate of Hofstra College, a former Wall Street clerk and an American Nazi, said that Robert M. Shelton, the imperial wizard of the United Klans of America, who was a recent Congressional witness, would attend.

Rotella's announcement came as the klan was reliably reported to be no more than a small, ragtag band, so starved for new recruits that it has abandoned historical klan policy and indicated willingness to accept Jews as members.

The klan has been effectively infiltrated by Union County and Elizabeth law-enforcement officials. They reported today that the klan had fallen on poor days in the state.

"Jersey kluxers could practically meet in a telephone booth," a Union County detective said derisively, as he rattled a local newspaper headline warning: "Klan Organizing New Drive."

United Press International

Frank W. Rotella

Official assessment of klan strength follows reports of scattered klan cross-burnings and pamphleteering and the recent Passaic County grand jury investigation of Rotella, who was dismissed from his New York City job when the news of his klan leadership in New Jersey was made public last fall.

Since then Rotella has concentrated on recruiting new members and publicity for the klan. He has lost much of the friendly disposition that he had as a welfare worker, and he now carries a concealed aerosol can loaded with blinding chemicals for self-defense.

Rotella lives secretively in the 500 block of Westminster Avenue in a decaying section of Elizabeth. He refuses to give a telephone number, and his last Post Office box number in Hoboken is no longer in use.

Despite Rotella's boasts that the klan in New Jersey "is growing by leaps and bounds," the police report that he has failed to attract a large following—less than 100 members. Right after The Newark Star-Ledger reproduced a klan recruitment flyer, Rotella received nearly 100 applications through the mail. However, the police said nearly every one of the applicants dropped out after attending their first meeting.

Apparently what they hoped to see was a secret, sinister klan meeting, where everyone wore rich klan regalia. But only about six New Jersey klansmen have been able to afford official klan robes.

New Year Party a Flop

The klan's biggest social event of the year is its annual New Year's Eve party. But the last one—in the back room of a South Broad Street tavern in Elizabeth—was a flop. Less than a dozen klan faithful showed up. Food that had been prepared was given away free later to regular customers out front.

Klan leaders have attempted to tighten security measures at their meetings, and they now use secret signs, challenges, passwords and handshakes. Despite the precautions, law-enforcement officials keep on bumping into each other, even at small klan meetings.

Officials are confident that klansmen at the Bridgeton rally probably will be outnumbered by Federal Bureau of Investigation agents, state troopers, sheriff's deputies, county and local police, newspaper reporters, television cameras and curiosity seekers.

Rotella believes that publicity, no matter how adverse to the klan, is one of his greatest weapons. This explains, he says, why klansmen burn a lot of crosses.

Most of the klan's newer members are leather-jacketed young toughs who are, according to the police, "in it just for the action." Like Rotella, some new members are Roman Catholics, the police say. The klan recently dropped "white, Protestant" requirements here and in New York and Pennsylvania.

System Shocks Police

Rotella has recently urged klansmen to go out of their way to be friendly to the police, who were shocked to learn that he was planning a makeshift telephone-warning system, to be used this summer at the first sign of possible Negro unrest. Klansmen want to act as a kind of militia to aid the local police.

"Can you imagine me trying to keep back an angry crowd of young Negroes with some damn kluxer standing beside me?" an Elizabeth policeman asked.

To this end, Rotella and many klan leaders have become karate experts and are urging members to become expert, too. They warn that anyone who strikes a klansman "will be cut to pieces." Rotella also talks about demonstrating against civil-rights groups and other klan opponents.

But the police doubt whether he can ever get his members to expose themselves publicly.

"You get one of these guys alone, and he'll swear up and down that he never heard of the klan; so we don't expect them to go marching around in public in their bedsheets," a detective remarked.

Alabama Riots to Be Worst In 100 Years, Craig Predicts

AC 4/18/66

FT. PAYNE, Ala. (UPI)—The Grand Dragon of the Georgia Ku Klux Kan told 300 persons Sunday that there would be more racial violence this summer in Alabama than in the past 100 years.

Georgia Dragon Calvin Craig, flanked by four members of the "Klan Security Guard," lashed out at the "government-controlled press and news media" for calling Klansmen "troublemakers and nightrides."

"My definition of a Klansman," Craig said, "is a patriotic red-blooded American who is willing to stand up for his country against the threat of communism."

The spectators at the Klan recruiting rally came from Alabama, Georgia and Tennessee.

Ernest Fortner, assistant grand dragon of Alabama, called Alabama Atty. Gen. Richmond Flowers, a candidate for governor, a "long, lanky red-haired liar" if he denied asking Klansmen for their support.

Flowers, running hard as a racial moderate, won the support during the weekend of two major Negro political organizations—both of which claimed to control 200,000 votes.

The Alabama Democratic Conference, in a convention at Birmingham Sunday, endorsed Flowers in the May 3 Democratic primary. Saturday night, the Confederation of Alabama Political Organizations, set up by civil rights workers who found the other group too conservative, also endorsed Flowers.

In other Ku Klux Klan action, a Superior Court hearing was to resume Monday in Lumberton, N.C., on whether an injunction barring Klan meetings in Robeson County should be made permanent.

The last time the Klan met in the county—in 1958—Lumbee Indians went on the warpath and routed the hooded order. Announcement of a proposed rally in the county on March 27, the state said, "Created a tense and dangerous situation" in the county and probably would "result in numerous killings."

Birchite Physician Gets Data on Conley Drugs

By BILL SHIPP

A militantly conservative DeKalb County physician says he has instructed "two or three" of his followers to discover and provide him with the specific location of certain medical supplies stored inside the sprawling Atlanta Army Depot. Dr. John R. Andrew, a leader in the John Birch Society, says his men have accomplished their mission.

The Minutemen, a Missouri-headquartered far-right paramilitary organization, has formed a unit in DeKalb County. (Dr. Andrew says he is not a member, but is aware of the unit.)

Robert B. DePugh, national leader of the Minutemen, is bombarding local members of the Birch Society and the Ku Klux Klan with letters warning that a Communist takeover of the United States is imminent.

(DePugh predicts a complete takeover by the early 1970s. Dr. Andrew says, however, that a takeover by United Nations troops could occur this summer if civil rights demonstrations and "riots" get out of hand.)

A "Demolition Priority" list for Atlanta has been drawn up and circulated in some extremist circles. (The newspapers, WSB radio and television and the "central telephone exchange" are among the top items on the list, a copy of which has been obtained by The Constitution.)

Extreme right-wing organizations also received catalogues recently on where to obtain information on firearms, demolition supplies and conduct of guerrilla warfare.

One such manual, which sells for $5, describes "explosives and the practical methods of using them," and includes instruction on the use of "black powder, dynamite blasting supplies and accessories, primers and methods of firing."

DR. J. R. ANDREW

An organization of "Christian Conservative Businessmen" has been formed as part of one Birch Society chapter, and on April 14 circulated among its membership a "preferred shopping guide" of 45 business places.

Dr. Andrew, considered one of the top spokesmen for the far right in this area, told two Constitution reporters this week about his efforts to pinpoint medical supplies at the Army Depot in Conley.

The subject came up when a reporter asked Dr. Andrew if anyone had provided him with any maps of military installations.

The 39-year-old physician replied that he wanted to find out where certain medical supplies were kept at the depot "in case of a holocaust."

"I asked this man I knew where the medical supplies were. I knew he worked at Conley," Dr. Andrew said. "He told me there was plenty out there."

Later in the conversation, Dr. Andrew said "two or three" persons were involved in getting the information, but he refused to identify them.

He said he was later told "the building numbers where the medical supplies were." Dr. Andrew said this happened several months ago.

The general practitioner, who says he stands "a little to the right" of the Birch Society, said the person who provided him with the information about the Army Depot "recently asked me if I wanted to go and look over the place. I told him, 'No.' They'd think I was some kind of agent for the Minutemen."

Asked why he needed to know where the medical supplies were stored, Dr. Andrew said he feared that "everyone out there would be dead" in the event of "a holocaust."

"I'm a doctor. I dread the day when I get 100 calls, when a disaster comes. I want to know where I can get medical supplies," he said.

A spokesman for the Army Depot said general information about supplies there is not classified but he said he has called on the FBI to investigate reports of specific information being given out.

The supplies Dr. Andrew wanted to know about included a quantity of drugs, such as 10 antibiotics and morphine, dilaudid and demerol.

Dr. Andrew repeatedly denied that he was a Minuteman, but said he had received literature from DePugh and had been a subscriber to the Minuteman magazine, "On Target."

However, he added, "It's ridiculous to have an organization like this. . . . Who is to determine when they go into action?"

Nevertheless, Dr. Andrew said he liked the Minutemen's idea of "We'll never surrender."

As for the quick take-over of the U.S., as predicted by the Minutemen, Dr. Andrew has his own ideas about that.

Conceivably, it could come this summer, he said, unless civil rights "demonstrations and riots" are held in check.

Forty cities have been designated as probable spots for Watts-type riots to break out, the black-haired, bespectacled physician said.

If these riots occurred at about the same time and were not controlled, Dr. Andrew pointed out, troops "of the United Nations might take over" and occupy the United States.

Dr. Andrew said he is concerned about having too many U.S. troops committed overseas.

Dr. Andrew, a one-time liberal and a "kind of Zen Buddhist," is now an avid opponent of the U.N., which he sees as part of a world-wide conspiracy aimed at one-world government.

"This started with Woodrow Wilson and Col. E. M. House," Dr. Andrew said.

HE'S A VETERAN

Although a veteran of World War II, Dr. Andrew said he now believes the U.S. should never have gotten into the war. He said Germany would have wiped out Russia, China and Communism, then the German High Command would have "killed that nut Hitler."

Dr. Andrew is a native of Rockdale County, a graduate of Tech High School, the old Atlanta Division of the University of Georgia and the Medical College of Georgia. He was a member of the NAACP in 1952 and of the liberal Unitarian Church. He said he left the church about 1954-55 when the "unitarians started this movement to take God off coins."

He is a former leader of a John Birch chapter officially designated as CMHX. The chapter continues to meet at his home.

Dr. Andrew was an unsuccessful Republican candidate for the Georgia House last year. The physician, who has addressed the KKK but considers that group "too hot tempered," said he plans to run again this year.

Of the Birch Society, Dr. Andrew has this to say:

"I consider the Birch Society a kind of high school. There's graduate work beyond that. We need not just the educational programs but an action program, a positive program."

Dr. Andrew said he is a gun enthusiast but has never participated in any of the paramilitary exercises of the Minutemen. He said he knew of their existence in DeKalb County because of "a bulletin" he saw.

He said an agent of the Anti-Defamation League of B'Nai B'rith is after him and has tried to connect him with the Minutemen. He said two FBI agents also have interviewed him about the Minutemen.

The Minutemen have been active in this area for about a year and membership includes an estimated 15 men, The Constitution has learned from a reliable source.

The Minutemen have carried on firearms practice and drills locally and have pledged themselves not to reval their membership, the source said.

THE FIRST DATE

Prospective local members of the Minutemen recently received a three-page letter from DePugh, "national coordinator" of the organization, in which he declared:

"July 4, 1966 is the first date on our time table."

DePugh did not elaborate on what would occur on that day.

Here's how DePugh, in his letter, sees what he calls the pending Communist take-over:

"The Communist conquest of our nation will continue through internal subversion and gradual destruction of our economy. . . .

"Race war may be provoked at some future time in an attempt to lure armed civilians into the open and as an excuse to declare martial law in certain areas. . . .

"Civilians will be gradually disarmed, not so much by confiscating guns they now possess as by drying up sources of ammunition — which is already being done. Later on, the private ownership of firearms will be discouraged by a yearly federal tax. . . .

"Government economists are hoping to effect a plan within a very few years whereby there will be no further need for paper money. Each employe will be required to have a bank account that is affiliated with the Federal Reserve System. . . .

"Major business dealings will be made by transfers of bank credits. . . . A federal permit will be required to move from one state to another. . . .

"According to our best information, Socialist control will be virtually complete by 1973 or 1974."

But that needn't happen, says DePugh, if local activists will join his group, then follow his "month-by-month time table for first reversing the trend then ultimately saving our national and individual freedom."

DePugh who operates out of Norborne, Mo., claims a membership of 25,000.

The "Demolition Priority" list reportedly was drawn up after a discussion of whether "the enemy" should be contained within Atlanta. In addition to communications facilities, the list includes bridges, railroad stations, the airport and City Hall.

The prisoner captured in North Carolina Thursday was arrested after state troopers spotted his car on N. C. 27, about 25 miles from the home of a girl friend of Clark's.

Clark had escaped April 13 from the Central Corrections Institution in Columbia where he was being held on two 10-year terms for larceny and pointing a pistol at another. Police were stationed in the area of his girl friend's home after receiving reports he had been seen there.

He surrendered without a struggle. Authorities said he had fastened another license tag over the one from the car stolen in DeKalb County.

Action and Reaction

HOME: Social Essays. By LeRoi Jones. 252 pp. New York: William Morrow & Co. $4.

By ROBERT BONE

THERE is a line from Countee Cullen which expresses the intent of this collection: "My spirit has come home, that sailed the doubtful seas." LeRoi Jones writes in the mood of a Prodigal Son who has returned at last to his blackness. He celebrates his homecoming in some 20 essays, written between 1960 and 1965. In the title piece, Mr. Jones asks us to take note of the movement of these essays, and to view it as a linear progression toward his Negritude. Actually it represents the swing of a pendulum from assimilationism to Negro nationalism, from an extreme hatred of self to an extreme hatred of whites.

The art of being Negro in America is an art of balance. Conflicting impulses — toward whiteness, toward blackness—must be held in a precarious equilibrium. What strikes one most about the career of LeRoi Jones is precisely its lack of balance, from his early Greenwich Village days to his role as director of the Black Arts Repertory Theater. In the early days, his closest friends, his wife and his verse were rather conspicuously Caucasian. Now all that has changed, and he parades his blackness. In neither phase does one encounter the complexity, the creative tension, the double vision we have come to look for in the most perceptive Negro authors.

The present phase of Jones's career can only be described as rabid. Toward the end of this collection, the writing rises to a crescendo of hatred and invective. The last 60 pages are indistinguishable in tone and content from Muhammad Speaks; they differ in no respect from the rantings of black nationalist street speakers. As the pendulum moves through the middle ranges, however, on its way to this extreme, Jones has some important things to say. The early pieces, written between 1960 and 1963, are often arresting and sometimes persuasive. Thereafter Jones enters the fantasyland of black nationalism.

At the heart of these early essays is a dispute over the nature of reality. The view from the top of the hill and the view from the bottom, Jones insists, are not the same. It follows that the Negro writer, in assuming the burden of self-definition, must liberate himself from the white man's definitions of reality. For the truth about the Negro has never been admitted to the consciousness of his oppressor. Preventing it has been a screen of twisted images and grotesque stereotypes. Hence the Negro writer's determination to "tell it like it is," and not the way the white man says it is.

An official version of reality, for example, permeates the thinking of the white South: "Governor Wallace, on television, admonishes his black housekeeper warmly, 'Y'all take care of everything, heah?' The old woman smiles, and goes off to take care of his baby. That is the Negro that really exists for him. No other. The smiling convicts raking up leaves in his yard. He waves as he crosses to the car. More real Negroes. He is on his way to the University to make the fake Negroes disappear."

THE white Southerner, we may perhaps agree, is the victim of his own hallucinations. But when Jones extends his discussion to the realm of foreign policy, we begin to feel uneasy. Is it possible that America is responding to the colonial revolution in the jaundiced spirit of a James Eastland? "The Negro who wants the foot off his neck must be inspired by Communists." So the whites believe in Mississippi. But time and again, says Jones, confronted with national liberation movements in Asia, Africa, and Latin America, we have opposed the legitimate aspirations of the people in the name of anti-Communism. Here too are twisted images, falsified reality, and often enough a course of action based on dangerous hallucinations.

Not for nothing, then, does the present work begin with a long essay on the Cuban revolution. In the summer of 1960, Jones traveled to Cuba with a group of Negro intellectuals. Uninvolved in politics during his bohemian period, he is naive about the Communist involvement in recent Cuban history. But he brings back three home truths, however much they may offend the Yankee ear: first, that the Castro regime commands widespread popular support, by virtue of its program of agrarian reform; second, that Washington's determination to isolate if not destroy the revolution has more to do with overseas investment than with ideology; and third, that the Latin-American intelligentsia has entered a period of revolutionary ferment, the end of which will not be witnessed in our time.

Several essays are subsequently devoted to an attack on tokenism among white liberals. This theme is not unrelated to the foreign-policy considerations raised in the opening essay. For many American liberals, who do not subscribe to the tribal orthodoxy of Mississippi, do endorse official versions of overseas reality—or at the very least remain ambivalent, unable to resolve conflicting claims upon their loyalty. This unwillingness to challenge the official State Department view accounts for the political paralysis of contemporary liberalism. Putting it another way, liberals have failed to place the Negro revolution in a world perspective.

About a third of the collection is devoted to literary subjects, and here Jones is distinctly at his best. Three essays in particular contain the most considered writing of the present volume. "The Myth of a Negro Literature" states the case for disaffiliation from the value system and the world view of the white middle class. "Expressive Language" explores the relationship between Negro speech, emotional nuance and cultural expression. "Hunting Is Not Those Heads on the Wall" attempts to define an esthetic. In his emphatic rejection of formal art, of tradition and of classical restraint, Jones betrays his affinity for that neo-Romantic permissiveness, that unbridled self-indulgence, which links him to the poets of the Beat generation.

We have finally to deal with five or six pieces which are not so much essays as fulminations. Ostensibly they announce the author's conversion to black nationalism; in reality they signal an esthetic breakdown, a fatal loss of artistic control. The prose disintegrates, the tone becomes hysterical, and all pretense of logical argument is abandoned. The style, shall we say, is severely disturbed.

THE consequences are apparent in the following passage, from an essay called "The Legacy of Malcolm X and the Coming of the Black Nation": "The concepts of National Consciousness and the Black Nation, after the death of Malik, have moved to the point where now some Black People are demanding national sovereignty as well as National (and Cultural) Consciousness. In Harlem, for instance, as director of the Black Arts Repertory Theater School, I have issued a call for a Black Nation. In Harlem, where 600,000 Black People reside. The first act must be the nationalization of all properties and resources belonging to white people, within the boundaries of the Black Nation." (My italics).

LeRoi Jones, it is now apparent, is hoping to assume the mantle of the late Malcolm X. But pass over the self-aggrandizement; pass over the element of fantasy; concentrate on the unintended ambiguity of first act. Here is a playwright who has lost the fundamental distinction between image and event, between a scenario and a political program. This blurring of boundaries, this loss of discriminative power, is the price that Jones has paid for the unrestrained indulgence of his hate.

BIRCH SOCIETY PLANS NO CUTS IN CAMPAIGN

EXTREMISM

BELMONT, Mass., May 9 (UPI).—The John Birch Society, which has been losing money and lagging in recruitment of new members, plans no cutback in its campaign to extend its influence, it was disclosed today.

Robert H. W. Welch Jr., founder and president of the society, announced in his May bulletin that the society had fallen $1-million behind its goal for 1965 and acknowledged that the membership "did not catch up to the projected level to match and support the expanded field staff."

He said, however, that the society's national council had "firmly decided against cutting back at all."

Mr. Welch said the society's operating overhead was running considerably ahead of its income but that its monthly magazine and weekly paper were "steadily gaining in circulation and influence."

"What we need right now is a contribution of at least $1,000 from every person receiving this message," he declared.

Mr. Welch also said the society and its members spent a total of $5-million in 1965 while taking in $4,089,000. Contributions in 1964 totaled $3.2-million.

He said members had spent approximately $1-million on their own in 1965 for newspaper advertisements and other activities.

Moscow Chess Postponed By Illness of Petrosian

The 13th game of the 24-game title cheese match between Tigran Petrosian, the world champion, and Boris Spassky, both of the Soviet Union, was postponed in Moscow last night because Petrosian was ill, according to Tass, the Soviet news agency. No details were given of the champion's illness.

The score in the match, being played at the Variety Theater, stands at 7-5 for Petrosian.

Under the rules of the International Chess Federation, each player may postpone no more than three games on account of illness. Yesterday's was the first game of the match. The next game is scheduled for Wednesday.

Top Bircher Sees Red Plot in Dixie

5/21/66 AC

By DIANE THOMAS

America's racial turmoil is a Communist-inspired movement to establish a Soviet Negro Republic in the Dixie states, John Birch Society founder Robert Welch said in Atlanta Friday night.

"Hundreds of thousands of whites will be killed and tens of thousands of responsible Negroes along with them" if the Communists carry through their plot, Welch said.

In a two-hour speech interrupted 13 times by applause, the leader of the conservative Birchers lashed out at Chief Justice Earl Warren ("the man most admired by the Communists"), American college students ("brainwashed by the Communists"), SEATO, the United Nations, the Johnson administration in general, and in particular U.S. strategy in Viet Nam.

"Our war in Viet Nam is being run by Edward Lansdale, Henry Cabot Lodge and McNamara's Band," he said to loud applause. "Our Viet Nam line is as nutty as a pecan pie."

DIVERSION CHARGED

He charged the war is a diversionary tactic to enable the Communists to move toward total government in the U.S.

"The fact we are at war will be an excuse for the rationing of food and fuels, allocation of materials . . . and making opposition to government policies equal to treason," Welch told some 800 persons assembled in the Biltmore Hotel's exhibition hall.

The Communists will work to bring on total government and then turn the nation into a police state, he asserted.

In reply to "the sizeable portion of the American press that slavishly follows the Communist line" by labeling the Birch Society a "hate group," Welch declared, "We don't hate anybody, not even Earl Warren." The group, he said, is only opposed to the principles of Communism.

At one point in his speech, Welch paused to halt a television cameraman who was shooting film directly in fornt of the platform.

"Let's dont," he told the photographer. "That's idstracting to everybody. If you want more pictures, I'll stand still for them later."

48-STAR FLAG

Welch stood before a mammoth 48-star American flag which covered nearly a third of the front wall. Smaller 50-star banners decorated pillars in the hall.

Platform guests included Mr. and Mrs. John Birch, Sr. Their son, a native of Macon, Ga., was murdered by Chinese Communists at the end of World War II. The society is named for him.

Audience members included former Georgia Comptroller General Zack Gravey and current gubernatorial candidate Lester Maddox.

At the rear of the hall was a set of tables comprising the "American Opinion Book Store" and offering "a complete collection of conservative, patriotic literature."

Volumes on display included "McGuffey's 4th Eclectic Reader," "The Grim Truth about Fluoridation," George Orwell's "1984" and the Holy Bible.

The meeting was sponsored by John Birch Society groups in the five-county Atlanta area.

Petitioners Urge Probe of King Unit

Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON, D.C.—A huge roll of paper, made up of reprints from a page in Roy Harris' Augusta Courier, with signatures on the back, was presented Thursday to the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) as a petition to investigate Communist infiltration into major civil rights organizations.

The petitions were presented by the Rev. Bill Beeny, 28, pastor of the St. Louis, Mo. Baptist Temple.

Beeny said the roll of petitions contained 106,341 signatures, which he said were collected with the assistance of Sheriff Jim Clark of Selma, Ala., and the John Birch Society.

The petitions requested an investigation into the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) headed by Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. of Atlanta, the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), and the Black Muslims.

In a statement Thursday night from his Chicago headquarters Dr. King said, "The civil rights movement is dedicated to establishing a truly democratic society within the framework of the American Constitution. My personal philosophy is so diametrically opposed to communism that it is not even worthy of me to defend myself on this charge."

Two Deep South HUAC members, who served on a sub-committee that conducted extensive public hearings in Ku Klux Klan activities during the past six months, took opposite views of the proposed civil rights probe.

Atlanta Rep. Charles L. Weltner, a Democrat, said: "I am not inclined to support any petition prepared and submitted by the John Birch Society and the White Citizens Council."

Rep. John Buchanan, R-Ala., issued a statement endorsing the proposed investigation.

Leaders of civil rights and civil liberties organizations had protested the KKK investigation, charging it would be used as a means for the conservative-dominated HUAC to begin looking into civil rights activities.

Signatures on the batch of petitions were written on the back of a reprint from the Augusta Courier, a red-head-lined tabloid newspaper published by arch-segregationist Roy Harris. Date of publication in Harris' newspaper was July 8, 1963, according to the reprint.

The photographic reprint was described in a caption as a picture of Dr. Martin Luther King attending a meeeting at the Highlander Folk School in Monteagle, Tenn., on Labor Day weekend in 1957.

"The photographer was sent to the Highlander Folk School by the Georgia Commission on Education," stated the caption.

Rep. Weltner said he sees no grounds for investigating activities of SCLC, CORE or SNCC.

"I view the duty of this committee is to investigate significant organizations that have as their purpose the forceful overthrow of the United States and the forceful deprivation of citizens' rights guaranteed by the Constitution," said the Atlanta congressman.

Weltner said he supported a HUAC resolution on March 30, 1965, directing a continuing inquiry into the KKK, the Black Muslims, the Minutemen, and the American Nazi Party.

"In spite of the terribly bad judgment of SNCC, I have seen no evidence that SNCC is trying to overthrow the government of the United States," said Weltner. "I don't know of any substantial basis for making that accusation against SCLC or CORE."

Rep. Buchanan said FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover had reported Communist influence in some civil rights activities, and the Alabama congressman advocated finding out the degree of influence.

Buchanan praised unnamed civil rights leaders who he said had rejected Communist influence.

Rep. William Tuck, D-Va., ranking HUAC member, and Buchanan received the bundle of petitions from Beeny.

HUAC Chairman Edwin Willis, D-La., is ill and could not comment on the prospects of an investigation into civil rights activities.

Dr. Nabrit, my fellow Americans: I am delighted at the chance to speak at this important and this historic institution. Howard has long been an outstanding center for the education of Negro Americans. Its students are of every race and color and they come from many countries of the world. It is truly a working example of democratic excellence.

Our earth is the home of revolution. In every corner of every continent men charged with hope contend with ancient ways in the pursuit of justice. They reach for the newest of weapons to realize the oldest of dreams, that each may walk in freedom and pride, stretching his talents, enjoying the fruits of the earth.

Our enemies may occasionally seize the day of change, but it is the banner of our revolution they take. And our own future is linked to this process of swift and turbulent change in many lands in the world. But nothing in any country touches us more profoundly, and nothing is more freighted with meaning for our own destiny than the revolution of the Negro American.

In far too many ways American Negroes have been another nation: deprived of freedom, crippled by hatred, the doors of opportunity closed to hope.

In our time change has come to this nation too. The American Negro, acting with impressive restraint, has peacefully protested and marched, entered the courtrooms and the seats of government, demanding a justice that has long been denied. The voice of the Negro was the call to action. But it is a tribute to America that, once aroused, the courts and the Congress, the President and most of the people, have been the allies of progress.

Thus we have seen the high court of the country declare that discrimination based on race was repugnant to the Constitution, and therefore void. We have seen in 1957, 1960, and again in 1964, the first civil rights legislation in this nation in almost an entire century.

As majority leader of the United States Senate, I helped to guide two of these bills through the Senate. And, as your President, I was proud to sign the third. And now very soon we will have the fourth--a new law guaranteeing every American the right to vote.

No act of my entire administration will give me greater satisfaction than the day when my signature makes this bill too the law of this land.

The voting rights bill will be the latest, and among the most important, in a long series of victories. But this victory--as Winston Churchill said of another triumph for freedom--"is not the end. It is not even the beginning of the end. But it is, perhaps, the end of the beginning."

That beginning is freedom; and the barriers to that freedom are tumbling down. Freedom is the right to share, share fully and equally, in American society--to vote, to hold a job, to enter a public place, to go to school. It is the right to be treated in every part of our national life as a person equal in dignity and promise to all others.

But freedom is not enough. You do not wipe away the scars of centuries by saying: Now you are free to go where you want, or do as you desire, and choose the leaders you please.

You do not take a person who, for years, has been hobbled by chains and liberate him, bring him up to the starting line of a race and then say, "you are free to compete with all the others," and still justly believe that you have been completely fair.

Thus it is not enough just to open the gates of opportunity. All our citizens must have the ability to walk through those gates.

This is the next and the more profound stage of the battle for civil rights. We seek not just freedom but opportunity. We seek not just legal equity but human ability--not just equality as a right and a theory, but equality as a fact and equality as a result.

For the task is to give twenty million Negroes the same chance as every other American to learn and grow, to work and share in society, to develop their abilities--physical, mental and spiritual, and to pursue their individual happiness.

To this end equal opportunity is essential, but not enough. Men and women of all races are born with the same range of abilities. But ability is not just the product of birth. Ability is stretched or stunted by the family you live with, and the neighborhood you live in, by the school you go to and the poverty or the richness of your surroundings. It is the product of a hundred unseen forces playing upon the little infant, the child, and finally the man.

This graduating class at Howard University is witness to the indomitable determination of the Negro American to win his way in American life.

The number of Negroes in schools of higher learning has almost doubled in fifteen years. The number of nonwhite professional workers has more than doubled in ten years. The median income of Negro college women tonight exceeds that of white college women. And there are also the enormous accomplishments of distinguished individual Negroes--many of them graduates of this institution, and one of them the first lady ambassador in the history of the United States.

These are proud and impressive achievements. But they tell only the story of a growing middle class minority, steadily narrowing the gap between them and their white counterparts.

But for the great majority of Negro Americans--the poor, the unemployed, the uprooted and the dispossessed--there is a much grimmer story. They still, as we meet here tonight, are another nation. Despite the court orders and the laws, despite the legislative victories and the speeches, for them the walls are rising and the gulf is widening.

Here are some of the facts of this American failure.

Thirty five years ago the rate of unemployment for Negroes and whites was about the same. Tonight the Negro rate is twice as high.

In 1948 the 8 percent unemployment rate for Negro teenage boys was actually less than that of whites. By last year that rate had grown to 23 percent, as against 13 percent for whites unemployed.

Between 1949 and 1959, the income of Negro men relative to white men declined in every section of this country. From 1952 to 1963 the median income of Negro families compared to white actually dropped from 57 percent to 53 percent.

In the years 1955 through 1957, 22 percent of experienced Negro workers were out of work at some time during the year. In 1961 through 1963 that proportion had soared to 29 percent.

Since 1947 the number of white families living in poverty has decreased 27 percent while the number of poorer nonwhite families decreased only 3 percent.

The infant mortality of nonwhites in 1940 was 70 percent greater than whites. Twenty-two years later it was 90 percent greater.

Moreover, the isolation of Negro from white communities is increasing, rather than decreasing as Negroes crowd into the central cities and become a city within a city.

Of course Negro Americans as well as white Americans have shared in our rising national abundance. But the harsh fact of the matter is that in the battle for true equality too many are losing ground every day.

We are not completely sure why this is. We know the causes are complex and subtle. But we do know the two broad basic reasons. And we do know that we have to act.

First, Negroes are trapped--as many whites are trapped--in inherited, gateless poverty. They lack training and skills. They are shut in slums, without decent medical care. Private and public poverty combine to cripple their capacities.

We are trying to attack these evils through our poverty program, through our education program, through our medical care and our other health programs and a dozen more of the Great Society programs that are aimed at the root causes of this poverty.

We will increase, and we will accelerate, and we will broaden this attack in years to come until this most enduring of foes finally yields to our unyielding will. But there is a second cause--much more difficult to explain, more deeply grounded, more desperate in its force. It is the devastating heritage of long years of slavery; and a century of oppression, hatred and injustice.

For Negro poverty is not white poverty. Many of its causes and many of its cures are the same. But there are differences--deep, corrosive, obstinate differences--radiating painful roots into the community, and into the family, and the nature of the individual.

These differences are not racial differences. They are solely and simply the consequence of ancient brutality, past injustice, and present prejudice. They are anguishing to observe. For the Negro they are a constant reminder of oppression. For the white they are a constant reminder of guilt. But they must be faced and they must be dealt with and they must be overcome, if we are ever to reach the time when the only difference between Negroes and whites is the color of their skin.

Nor can we find a complete answer in the experience of other American minorities. They made a valiant and a largely successful effort to emerge from poverty and prejudice.

The Negro, like these others, will have to rely mostly on his own efforts. But he just can not do it alone. For they did not have the heritage of centuries to overcome, and they did not have a cultural tradition which had been twisted and battered by endless years of hatred and hopelessness, nor were they excluded--these others--because of race or color--a feeling whose dark intensity is matched by no other prejudice in our society.

Nor can these differences be understood as isolated infirmities. They are a seamless web. They cause each other. They result from each other. They reinforce each other.

Much of the Negro community is buried under a blanket of history and circumstance. It is not a lasting solution to lift just one corner of that blanket. We must stand on all sides and we must raise the entire cover if we are to liberate our fellow citizens.

One of the differences is the increased concentration of Negroes in our cities. More than 73 percent of all Negroes live in urban areas compared with less than 70 percent of the whites. Most of these Negroes live in slums. Most of these Negroes live together--a separated people.

Men are shaped by their world. When it is a world of decay, ringed by an invisible wall, when escape is arduous and uncertain, and the saving pressures of a more hopeful society are unknown, it can cripple the youth and it can desolate the man.

There is also the burden that a dark skin can add to the search for a productive place in society. Unemployment strikes most swiftly and broadly at the Negro, and this burden erodes hope. Blighted hope breeds despair. Despair brings indifference to the learning which offers a way out. And despair, coupled with indifference, is often the source of destructive rebellion against the fabric of society.

There is also the lacerating hurt of early collision with white hatred or prejudice, distaste or condescension. Other groups have felt similar intolerance. But success and achievement could wipe it away. They do not change the color of a man's skin. I have seen this uncomprehending pain in the eyes of the little Mexican-American schoolchild that I taught many years ago. But it can be overcome. But, for many, the wounds are always open.

Perhaps most important--its influence radiating to every part of life--is the breakdown of the Negro family structure. For this, most of all, white America must accept responsibility. It flows from centuries of oppression and persecution of the Negro man. It flows from the long years of degradation and discrimination, which have attacked his dignity and assaulted his ability to provide for his family.

This, too, is not pleasant to look upon. But it must be faced by those whose serious intent is to improve the life of all Americans.

Only a minority--less than half--of all Negro children reach the age of 18 having lived all their lives with both of their parents. At this moment, tonight, little less than two-thirds are at home with both of their parents. Probably a majority of all Negro children receive Federally-aided public assistance sometime during their childhood.

The family is the cornerstone of our society. More than any other force it shapes the attitude, the hopes, the ambitions, and the values of the child. And when the family collapses it is the children that are usually damaged. When it happens on a massive scale the community itself is crippled.

So, unless we work to strengthen the family, to create conditions under which most parents will stay together--all the rest: schools, and playgrounds, and public assistance, and private concern, will never be enough to cut completely the circle of despair and deprivation.

There is no single easy answer to all of these problems. Jobs are part of the answer. They bring the income which permits a man to provide for his family.

Decent homes in decent surroundings and a chance to learn--an equal chance to learn--are part of the answer.

Welfare and social programs better designed to hold families together are part of the answer.

Care for the sick is part of the answer. An understanding heart by all Americans is another big part of the answer.

And to all these fronts--and a dozen more--I will dedicate the expanding efforts of the Johnson Administration.

But there are other answers still to be found. Nor do we fully understand even all of the problems. Therefore, I want to announce tonight that this fall I intend to call a White House conference of scholars, and experts, and outstanding Negro leaders--men of both races--and officials of Government at every level.

This White House conference's theme and title will be "To Fulfill These Rights." Its object will be to help the American Negro fulfill the rights which, after the long time of injustice, he is finally about to secure; to move beyond opportunity to achievement; to shatter forever not only the barriers of law and public practice, but the walls which bound the condition of man by the color of his skin; to dissolve, as best we can, the antique enmities of the heart which diminish the holder, divide the great democracy, and do wrong--great wrong--to the children of God.

And I pledge you tonight this will be a chief goal of my Administration, and of my program next year, and in years to come. And I hope, and I pray, and I believe, it will be a part of the program of all America.

For what is justice? It is to fulfill the fair expectations of man.

Thus, American justice is a very special thing. For, from the first, this has been a land of towering expectations. It was to be a nation where each man could be ruled by the common consent of all--enshrined in law, given life by institutions, guided by men themselves subject to its rule. And all--all of every station and origin--would be touched equally in obligation and in liberty.

Beyond the law lay the land. It was a rich land, glowing with more abundant promise than man had ever seen. Here, unlike any place yet known, all were to share the harvest.

And beyond this was the dignity of man. Each could become whatever his qualities of mind and spirit would permit--to strive, to seek, and, if he could, to find his happiness.

This is American justice. We have pursued it faithfully to the edge of our imperfections, and we have failed to find it for the American Negro.

So, it is the glorious opportunity of this generation to end the one huge wrong of the American nation and, in so doing, to find America for ourselves, with the same immense thrill of discovery which gripped those who first began to realize that here, at last, was a home for freedom.

All it will take is for all of us to understand what this country is and what this country must become.

The Scripture promises: "I shall light a candle of understanding in thine heart, which shall not be put out."

Together, and with millions more, we can light that candle of understanding in the heart of all America.

And, once lit, it will never again go out.

AS YOU PROBABLY KNOW, The Civil Rights Protection bill has been introduced in the Senate by a bipartisan group headed by Paul Douglas (D., Ill.) and Clifford Case (R., N.J.). Although the Leadership Conference has as yet taken no formal position on this bill, we are enclosing for your information a background paper prepared by the Washington Bureau of the NAACP. Still to be introduced is the Administration's bill on civil rights protection. When that is available, we will send you a comparison of the Administration and the Douglas-Case measures.

CONGRESS GETS THE CIVIL RIGHTS PROTECTION ACT OF 1966

A bipartisan group of 20 Senators headed by Paul Douglas (D., Ill.) and Clifford Case (R., N.J.), on Thursday, February 10, introduced the bill under the title, "The Civil Rights Protection Act of 1966" (S.2923).

The bill is a response to the violence at Selma and Birmingham, the street corner and highway killings of men and women peacefully asserting their constitutional rights, and the kind of outrageous justice that has resulted in the acquittal of practically self-confessed murders.

What the Douglas-Case Bill Contains

Its six titles provide for: non-discriminatory selection of juries in federal and state courts; removal of state crimes to federal courts in order to assure equal protection of the law; injunctions against police and private violence; removal to federal courts of cases brought against Negroes and civil rights workers with the clear purpose of harassing them and subjecting them to discriminatory and segregated trial; compensation for persons killed or injured while exercising their lawful rights; and non-discrimination in the employment of persons in jails and courts and all facilities of justice.

The Senators omitted from their bill a provision in the draft prepared by a committee of well-known civil rights attorneys that would permit the Civil Service Commission to remove state and local police officials whose violation of their constitutional duty resulted in death or maiming.

Representatives Charles C. Diggs, Jr. (D., Mich.) and Donald M. Fraser (D., Minn.) have introduced substantially the same bill in the House (H.R.12807 and H.R.12818); but they included the provision for removing state and local police officials who fail in their duty.

The bills are being referred to the House and Senate Judiciary Committees.

In addition to Senators Douglas and Case, the other sponsors of the Senate bill are: Philip Hart (D., Mich.), Jacob Javits (R., N.Y.), Wayne Morse (D., Ore.), Pat McNamara (D., Mich.), William Proxmire (D., Wis.), Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D., N.J.), Thomas J. Dodd (D., Conn.), Eugene J. McCarthy (D., Minn.), Hugh Scott (R., Pa.), Stephen M. Young (D., Ohio), Vance Hartke (D., Ind.), Maurine B. Neuberger (D., Ore.), Birch Bayh (D., Ind.), Gaylord Nelson (D., Wis.), Abraham Ribicoff (D., Conn.), Thomas J. McIntyre (D., N.H.), Walter F. Mondale (D., Minn.), Robert F. Kennedy (D., N.Y.).

In introducing the bill, Senator Douglas summarized its main provisions. Attached are excerpts from his speech. We also enclose an editorial from the New York Times, on the need for the bill.

IMPROVE JURY SELECTION

In the first place, the bill is designed to improve the selection of juries in both State and Federal courts. Jury lists are sometimes manipulated in a strange way to obtain virtually all white juries or such overwhelmingly white juries as to make any other representation merely token and of no account. It provides for a representative cross section of the population on jury lists, and to avoid discrimination on grounds of race or color in the selection of juries.

That is buttressed by provisions which would set up jury commissions in each Federal district court, which would put into effect a sampling plan subject to the approval of the Director of the Administrative Office of U.S. Courts which would furnish a representative cross section of the population of the Federal district without exclusion on the basis of race, color, sex, religious or political affiliation, or economic or social status.

In addition, literacy tests are banned for Federal juries, but the judge may exclude illiterate jurors from particular cases where reading is a significant factor, except that no person shall be excluded on this ground who has completed the sixth grade in an English-language school.

CAN APPLY TO STATE COURTS

With regard to the State courts, when a Federal district court finds that there has been discrimination on the ground of race or color, the Director of the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts would take over and would administer the selection of juries under the Federal system created by this act, and he might use the Federal jury list if that were practical. In other words, discrimination on grounds of race or color is the trigger for Federal action, but where this discrimination is found, the jury rules for fair juries apply.

These can be ordered into effect only by a Federal judge and upon appeal of the Attorney General. Of course, the assistance of the Bureau of Census can be called upon in the preparation of representative cross-sections.

JURISDICTION OF AND REMOVAL TO FEDERAL COURTS

The second feature is an important one because it makes it possible for the Federal courts to have jurisdiction of certain crimes when Federal prosecution is necessary to assure equal protection of the laws. That may seem to some of those who read the RECORD, as well as to those who are listening to my speech, to be a very radical proposal, but I would like to read from the report of the Civil Rights Commission for 1963, page 125, recommendation No. 4. The Commission recommended:

That Congress amend section 1443 of title 28 of the United States Code to permit removal by the defendant of a State civil action or criminal prosecution to a District Court of the United States in cases where the defendant cannot, in the State court, secure his civil rights because of the written or decisional laws of the State or because of the acts of individuals administering or affecting its judicial process.

So, we are merely carrying into effect the very important recommendation on this point by the Civil Rights Commission That was a unanimous recommendation.

If we may put this in simple terms, if a county or other political subdivision should exclude Negroes from juries, or deny the voting process to them, or otherwise discriminate in the administration of justice, State crimes against Negroes or civil rights workers would be triable in Federal court. But in order to give the Federal court jurisdiction there must be proof of such a segregated system of justice and, in the second place, a certificate by the Attorney General of the United States that prosecution in the Federal court would fulfill the responsibility of the U.S. Government to assure equal protection of the laws.

Under similar circumstances, the Attorney General may remove to Federal court a case which has already been commended in a State court. These provisions last for only 10 years and expire on the 1st of January 1975, or perhaps more technically speaking, 10 years after the date of enactment of this measure.

I hope that this will stimulate the States to purify their own jury systems and to improve their own systems of justice so that the transfer of jurisdiction need not occur in many cases, but will be held back in reserve and can be employed if the States and the civil subdivisions thereof continue to be derelict.

BROADENS FEDERAL OFFENSES

This title would also amend section 241 of the United States Code to broaden Federal offenses in the area of civil rights. It is believed that this broadening of Federal offenses may be the less important part of the title. The killer of a civil rights worker ought to be tried for the crime of murder rather than for depriving someone of his constitutional rights. Basically, that is what this title does.

EXTENSION OF OLD PART III

In addition, we have part III, which provides civil preventive relief to those who exercise rights under the 14th amendment to the Constitution. In a sense, this is the old title III or part III of the 1957 bill, which was debated before this body for many weeks, and upon which there was a rather close vote. It permits an individual or the Attorney General to obtain injunctions against violations of constitutional rights. This is now true in many circumstances, such as segregation in the schools, segregation in public facilities, the denial of voting rights, and the rest; but the proposed authority would also provide protection against police violence and private violence, and do it in advance, rather than to have, as so often occurs at present, futile subsequent trials, almost universally resulting in acquittal.

REMOVAL OF DEFENDANTS

The fourth title provides for the removal of defendants in certain cases from State to Federal district courts. This is where a county or other political subdivision provides a segregated and discriminatory system of justice.

Where a county or other political subdivision provides a segregated and discriminatory system of justice, those who attack Negroes and civil rights workers have almost universally done so with impunity, and Negroes and civil rights workers who themselves are chargd with crime have not received fair trials.

Just as title II of this bill provides for the prosecution in the Federal courts of those who attack Negroes and civil rights workers in areas of segregated justice, so title IV permits the removal to Federal courts by Negroes and civil rights workers who are subjected to prosecution in such areas.

CIVIL INDEMNIFICATION

A somewhat novel feature is introduced by title V, which I think is crucial. It provides for civil indemnification awards by a Federal board in certain cases where a person is injured in his person or property or is deprived of his life while he is lawfully exercising rights protected by the Constitution. This would be done by creating an indemnification board within the Civil Rights Commission to indemnify persons killed or injured or who have lost their property because of lawful civil rights activities. Just as the Federal Government assists those who have served their country, and just as States provide compensation for injured workmen, so those hurt in the struggle for civil rights should also be compensated.

Under this title, the Federal Government would make payments to the injured person and would then have the right to collect such payments from the person who caused the injury and from the State or political subdivision where the injury was caused by a person acting under color of law.

The idea that persons injured by unlawful acts should be allowed to bear the full burden of their losses, physical and financial, is being gradually replaced by the idea that the community owes some responsibility to those people. This proposal is an attempt to apply that principle to the field of civil rights.

FEPC EXTENDED TO STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT

Title VI provides that the FEPC provisions of the 1964 Civil Rights Act shall now be made applicable to State and local governmental units. It is only by integrating State and local personnel engaged in the administration of justice that equal protection of the laws can be made a reality.

EDITORIAL FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES, February 12, 1966

Still the Reconstruction

More than a century after Lincoln's death, the Negro's share in American life is a mingled portion of rich accomplishment and tragic inequality, of faith redeeemed and hope snuffed out, of brilliant opportunity and dark fear.

A bipartisan group of twenty Senators led by Paul H. Douglas of Illinois and Clifford Case of New Jersey has introduced this week a bill that seeks to dismantle yet another part of the rotting, unjust structure of segregation that still humiliates and contains many Negroes. The bill would reform Southern justice, enabling the Federal courts and prosecutors to take jurisdiction in state cases where a fair trial is not possible.

Such intervention could occur, for example, if Negroes were systematically excluded from juries. It would become a Federal crime to kill, injure, or intimidate Negroes trying to exercise their constitutional rights. The bill would insure that juries were selected from a representative cross-section of the population. Incentives to desegregate Southern police forces are provided, and victims of racial violence would be eligible for financial compensation.

President Johnson has already indicated his intention of recommending similar measures, but Senator Douglas and his colleagues have in the past pointed the way for Congress on Federal voting registrars and other innovations. Certainly, it is clear that legislation in this field is necessary. Numerous Negroes and white civil rights workers have lost their lives in recent years, but Southern state juries have repeatedly refused to convict in such cases. The miasma of fear must be lifted from the lives of Southern Negroes and those who battle to assure them genuine equality.

In the North the need is less for new laws than for a sense of urgency about removing the roots of tension. Six months after the riots in Watts, eighteen months after the upheavals in Harlem and Rochester, nothing very much has changed in the racial ghettoes. The bad housing and inferior schools are still there; the additional blue coliar jobs for the unskilled are still missing; the aimless, angry teen-ager is still drifting.

The American Negro has to help himself, but the larger society also has to do more than it has yet done to help him overcome decades of past discrimination and deprivation. A century after Lincoln, the Negro still has a claim on the American conscience.

Rights Regulation Hard to Enforce

FEDERAL POLICY

By JOHN HERBERS

(Copyright 1966 by the New York Times Co.)

WASHINGTON—One of the main sections of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, that pertaining to use of federal funds to attack discrimination, is not working nearly as well as many backers of the legislation had anticipated.

There is growing criticism from civil rights groups of the administration's enforcement of the section, Title VI, and there is disillusionment within the administration about what can be accomplished under Title VI without the addition of a large police force.

In some areas, the administration is putting new emphasis on alternate remedies that existed long before Title VI was passed — lawsuits and contract compliance.

"Title VI is the atomic bomb of civil rights," an administration source said. "We dare not use it all at once."

The title says there shall be no racial discrimination in any federally assisted program. Almost 200 federal programs are covered by it, but in only a few of these have stringent enforcement efforts been made.

Coordination of Title VI enforcement has rested with the Department of Justice since last September when Presiden Lyndon B. Johnson ordered a realignment of civil rights agencies and duties.

In new Title VI guidelines issued in December, the department made it clear that withholding or termination of funds by the executive branch was not always desirable.

"Compliance," the department said, "may often be obtained more promptly by appropriate court action than by hearings and termination of assistance."

The administration is threatening to get tough under another old remedy, contract compliance by executive order. For several years, the government has sought to end discrimination in firms holding federal contracts.

So far, no contract has been canceled for non-compliance. The policy has been to try to achieve voluntary compliance.

Gardner Concedes Gains in Health Facilities Are Slight

2/24/66

By CABELL PHILLIPS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Feb. 23 — Racial discrimination is still being practiced in many federally supported hospitals and other health facilities in violation of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Commission on Civil Rights said in a special report today.

The report, based on investigations in 40 communities in 12 Southern and Border states, was sharply critical of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, which administers most of the Federal health funds. It said the agency had been lax in learning the facts of discrimination, and slow to take corrective action where the facts were known.

The study was based on on-the-spot investigations of compliance with Title VI of the Civil Rights Act, which provides that Federal funds for local programs can be cut off whereever racial discrimination is practiced in the use of such funds.

The study was limited to four medical programs under the jurisdiction of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare and to the Head Start educational program administered by the Office of Economic Opportunity.

Gardner Concedes Lag

The commission's report is also critical of the preschool Head Start program, describing it as "a lost opportunity" for providing an integrated school atmosphere in the areas studied.

William L. Taylor, staff director for the commission, said at a news conference that the health agency had not cut off funds to any of the communities involved but that negotiations looking to that end were in process.

In a statement today, John W. Gardner, Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, conceded that his department had made little progress in imposing sanctions for evasions of the nondiscrimination law. He noted that new compliance machinery had been set up only a few months ago and that he was now assembling an investigative staff.

However, some preliminary steps toward enforcement have been taken, the Secretary said.

However, some preliminary steps toward enforcement have been taken, the Secretary said.

Two hundred hospitals and 87 school districts that have been found to be violating Title VI have been declared ineligible for new Federal funds but continue to receive money under grants previously approved.

Welfare Agencies Scored

The commission reported that less progress toward integrated medical service had been made by local welfare agencies than by any other group studied. Many doctors and hospitals who serve welfare clients, the report stated, have not even been told that the law forbids them to discriminate in rendering such services.

The most notable progress has been made in hospitals, the study found. It said that a few of the 39 institutions visited had abolished all forms of discrimination and most of the others had done away with such obvious symbols of segregation as separate wards, waiting rooms and toilets. But in the majority of hospitals "discernible patterns of noncompliance" still exist, it said.

"The pace at which hospitals had desegregated was primarily determined by the administrator or the board and was seldom the result of efforts by the PUBLIC Health Service staff of H.E.W.," the report said.

Politically Dangerous

The process of applying ultimate sanctions against a recalcitrant state or community is loaded with political and other hazards.

The Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, is required to notify Congress 30 days in advance of every such decision. In addition, the Secretary takes a moral dilemma in that the principal sufferers from such acitions would be persons on welfare rolls and the public, often served by only a single hospital or clinic.

A total denial of funds is regarded by many in the Government as unnecessary harsh and difficult to apply. Consideration is being given, therefore, to court action to enforce compliance in medical services.

There has been a disposition in the Welfare Administration to accept formal assurances from state welfare departments that their programs are nondiscriminatory. There is no official contact between the Federal agency and local welfare departments.

U.S. ACTS TO OPEN JOBS TO NEGROES

Civil Service Issues Rules on Federal Employment

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Feb. 24—The Civil Service Commission issued today new regulations designed to open more Federal jobs to Negroes and members of other minorities.

The regulations, which become effective April 3, will for the first time permit persons with grievances concerning racial discrimination to appeal to the commission from the agencies where the grievances originate.

Mandatory procedures are set down for agencies to "eradicate all vestiges of prejudice" and to assure new opportunities for employment and advancement of minorities.

Agency heads, for example, are directed to participate in community action with other public and private employers and educators "to improve employment opportunities and community conditions that effect employability."

The regulations, announced by John W. Macy Jr., the commission chairman, were drawn up under an executive order issued last September by President Johnson. The order abolished the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity and transferred its duties in Federal employment to the commission.

2.5-Million Jobs Affected

Under the previous setup, Mr. Macy said, grievances could be appealed to the President's committee but the committee had no power to order the agencies to end discrimination. It could only conciliate.

The commission, however, has power to order an agency to take corrective steps when it finds evidence of discrimination.

Mr. Macy said that the regulations applied to some 2.5 million Federal jobs in 30,000 cities, towns and villages.

The last survey of minority employment in the Federal Government, completed last July 1, showed that Negroes held 13.5 per cent of the Federal jobs. While most were in low-paying categories, the commission said that significant increases had been made in better paying jobs.

Mr. Macy said that the trend had continued in recent months.

In the past, minority employment has been measured by a face count. Racial designations on employment records were discontinued several years ago because it was believed such designations could be used to foster discrimination.

Computer Get Racial Data

The new regulations call for all employes to fill out forms designating their race or national origin. This information will not go into personnel records but will be filed separately and fed into computers to facilitate frequent checks on the racial balance in Federal employment.

Agency heads are directed to "conduct a continuing campaign to eradicate every form of prejudice or discrimination based upon race, creed, color or national origin."

Each agency is to appoint an equal employment opportunity officer and deputies, if needed, to assist the head of the agency.

The commission is to review periodically the steps each agency has taken to keep employment opportunities open.

Mr. Macy said that the regulations called for new emphasis on training, counseling and recruiting. For example, the commission is conducting a recruiting campaign in Negro colleges and agencies are directed to inform minority groups of the job opportunities available.

The new regulations, Mr. Macy said, "do not mean lowering of standards or ignoring basic concepts of the merit system." He said the agencies would have no quota for minority groups.

Control Centralized in Urban Department Administration

FEDERAL POLICY

By JOHN D. POMFRET

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Feb. 25—The White House today announced an organization plan for the new Department of Housing and Urban Development designed to give the department's Secretary strong centralized policy-making control. Regional administrators will have the power to make key operating decisions on their own.

The plan was outlined in a memorandum from Secretary Robert C. Weaver to President Johnson that was released by the White House press office.

The plan, which is to be put into effect gradually over the next few weeks, does not entail any new programs or functions. It is designed to prepare for what Mr. Weaver's memorandum called "a sound management framework" for carrying out the so-called Demonstration Cities Program should Congress approve it.

The program, submitted to Congress on Jan. 26 by Mr. Johnson, calls for the expenditure of $2.3-billion over six years to rebuild slum neighborhoods in 60 to 70 cities of various sizes. The cities have yet to be selected.

The organization plan places in the Secretary's office the important functions of budgeting and planning new programs and reviewing old ones.

Before the department was created, Mr. Weaver, as Administrator of the Housing and Home Finance Agency, presided over a set of loosely linked bureaus that retained virtual autonomy. The new organization plan is designed to bring these bureaus under Mr. Weaver's firm control.

The delegation of what the memorandum called "clear and unambiguous authority" in the department's seven regional administrators reflects a developing trend in Federal administrative philosophy that is being encouraged by the President. Basically, the theory is that the Federal Government cannot operate efficiently if all decisions have to be made in Washington.

The regional administrators will coordinate all the department's established programs and will have authority to make decisions in carrying them forward.

The demonstration programs, however, would be administered from Washington by "a small and mobile staff." The regional administrators would coordinate support in their areas for them.

The organization plan provides for an assistant secretary to administer the department's mortgage credit programs in the private housing field, a second to administer urban renewal and housing assistance programs in central cities, a third to run programs affecting larger urgan areas, and a fourth to develop experimental programs and to take care of relations with other Government departments and agencies.

Say O.E.O. Hasn't Allocated Money to Fight Illiteracy

FEDERAL POLICY

The opening of a nationwide program to combat illiteracy appears to have encountered resistance and delay in Washington.

The heads of the most important civil rights organizations at a meeting here yesterday expressed "serious concern" over the delays but were at a loss to understand the reasons. Nor were they able to identify those responsible fo the resistance to the opening of the program.

The drive is to be conducted by a new agency—The Center For Community-Action Education. James Farmer resigned as national director of the Congress of Racial Equality to head the projected program.

Difficulties with the Office of Economic Opportunity, which had approved the program, came to light after yesterday's meeting of the civil rights leaders.

Participating in the meeting were Whitney M. Young Jr. of the National Urban League, Roy Wilkens of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, James Forman of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee, Dorothy Haight of the National Council of Negro Women, and others.

A statement issued after the meeting blamed the O.E.O. for the difficulties in getting the program off the ground.

The statement said:

"The Council For United Civil Rights Leadership, in reaffirming its enthusiastic endorsement of the national literacy program planned by the Center For Community-Action Education, expresses its concern that this program has not yet been approved for funding by the Federal Office of Economic Opportunity lespite the fact that the sponsors of the program have met the long list of specification of the O.E.O."

The program's sponsors submitted their application to the O.E.O. last August 16th and, after many conferences in which views were adjusted and details worked out, were led to believe that the Federal government would finance its share of the program.

The agreed date for starting the program was Feb. 15th, 1966. This was postponed to March 1st.

The sponsors assumed that the latter date would see the program in being but as of yesterday no word has been received from Washington and there have been no replies to inquiries from the sponsors as to whether the decks had been finally cleared for action.

The O.E.S. was said to have committed itself to contribute $875,000 to finance 18 pilot projects during the first year if the new agency raised $100,000 from private sources.

LBJ Appoints Negro To FRB; Chairman May Lose Majority

Ark. Gazette 2/27/66

WASHINGTON — President Johnson reached into the ranks of his own administration Saturday and appointed a 39-year-old Negro as a member of the Federal Reserve Board.

The president said at a news conference that he was nominating Andrew F. Brimmer, now assistant Commerce secretary for economic affairs, to the vacancy created by the expiring term of Vice Chairman C. Canby Balderston.

Balderston was one of three other members who voted with Federal Reserve Board Chairman William McChesney Martin Jr. last December to raise the discount rate because of what Martin called the threat of inflation. Mr. Johnson vigorously opposed the 4 to 3 decision. Brimmer would be the first Negro ever to serve on the Board.

The nomination to the seven-man Board is for a term of 14 years, and is subject to Senate confirmation.

Mr. Johnson, it was learned, discussed the appointment with Martin before announcing it. Sources said that Martin urged the president to appoint a businessman to the vacancy so that commerce and industry could be represented in the Board's decisions. The Board, which operates independently of the executive branch, is the dominant agency controlling the nation's money supply and in setting interest rates.

Brimmer formerly worked as an economist for the New York Reserve Bank and in the Commerce Department has been dealing extensively with the nation's balance of payments problems.

Martin Endorses President's Choice

After President Johnson announced the appointment, Martin issued a statement that, in effect, endorsed it.

He said: "Mr. Brimmer achieved a very commendable record as a member of the economic research staff of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York during the 1950s and I believe that he can be counted upon to build further upon that record in his service as a member of the Board, especially in view of the experience he has gained as assistant secretary of commerce in working on the difficult problem of the nation's balance of payments."

This was interpreted as indicating that Martin has no intention of resigning in protest.

Native of Louisiana Has Doctorate Degree

Brimmer was born in Newelton, La. He moved to Bremerton, Wash., after graduating from high school at age 17.

He worked on a weekly newspaper in Washington while attending night school and later obtained bachelor's and master's degrees in economics at the University of Washington. He spent a year in India under a Fulbright scholarship and receive his doctorate from Harvard in 1957.

Negroes Decry Katzenbach Stress on Local Action

By JOHN HERBERS
Special to The New York Times

ATLANTA, Feb. 28—Attorney General Nicholas deB. Katzenbach told civil rights leaders today he expected more than half of the eligible Negroes in the Deep South to vote in this year's elections.

However, he said private organizations, rather than the Federal Government, had chief responsibility for getting them registered.

After his speech, which drew mild applause, some of the civil rights leaders expressed disappointment that Mr. Katzenbach had not pledged the immediate appointment of more Federal voting examiners under the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

"I still feel we need more registrars," said the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. "We will not be able to go into all the counties where there is a need with voter education projects."

"It looks like we will have to have more demonstrations to get examiners," said Dr. King, noting that examiners had been appointed in Birmingham after his organization, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, conducted street demonstrations there.

John Lewis, chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, said Mr. Katzenbach had made a "forthright statement" but that the Federal presence was needed at the polls in large areas of the South. He pointed out that there were no Federal examiners in Georgia, the state with the largest number of unregistered Negroes of voting age.

"He put the burden right back on us," said a member of the Southern Regional Council, which sponsored the meeting.

Their statements underscored a basic disagreement that still exists between civil rights groups and the Justice Department on voter registration despite stepped-up enforcement of the act and some impressive gains made under it.

Mr. Katzenbach spoke at a luncheon at Atlanta's new Marriotte Motor Hotel marking the start of a new Southwide voter education project by the council. A similar project resulted in the registration of about 700,000 Negroes in 11 states prior to the elections of 1964.

About 600 civil rights leaders, representing the major organanizations in all Southern states, attended.

Mr. Katzenbach said that as of Feb. 1 about 200,000 Negroes had been registered by local officials in voluntary compliance with the Voting Rights Act in Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Georgia and South Carolina, the five states principally affected.

In addition, he said, Federal examiners in 36 counties have registered more than 100,000 Negroes since the act was signed last Aug. 6, thus bringing the total five-state Negro

"I hope and expect," Mr. Katz- This represents less than 40 per cent of those eligible.

"I hope and expect," Mr. Katenbach said, "that by the time of the next election in each of these states, more than half of the voting-age Negro population will register—and will vote."

Mr. Katzenbach pointed out that Federal examiners had been sent in where local officials had refused to make registration accessible. He said he would appoint more examiners if necessary, but his speech stressed the duty of private organizations.

"The most important generating factor is local organizations," he declared. "Counties which have extensive Negro registration, whether by local officials or by Federal examiners, are counties in which registration campaigns have been conducted. In counties without such campaigns, even the presence of examiners has been of limited gain."

Clashes With Katzenbach During Senate Hearing

NYT 3/4/66

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 3—Senator Jacob K. Javits told Attorney General Nicholas deB. Katzenbach today that the Administration was about to send conciliators into racial disputes "with the prosecutor's pistol packed right on their side."

The New York Republican made the statement in questioning Mr. Katzenbach at length about President Johnson's controversial proposal to transfer the Community Relations Service from the Department of Commerce to the Justice Department.

Mr. Katzenbach, testifying before the Government Operations Subcommittee on Executive Reorganization, chain-smoked cigarettes and stuck by his argument that the transfer would enhance the cause of racial peace and civil rights.

Power Played Down

Senator Javits said he was "disquieted" that a racial conciliation agency was about to be placed under the department charged with enforcing the laws. He pointed out that much of the conciliation work by the service had involved businessmen in various communities.

"If you were a businessman," Mr. Javits asked, "and a man sent in his card and said, 'I'm from the Community Relations Service of the Department of Justice, tell me all you know in confidence,' what would you think about it?"

"I would think they employed an idiot," Mr. Katzenbach replied, adding that he did not think the Justice Department's power to bring lawsuits or the legal requirement that the service keep its negotiations secret would harm conciliation efforts.

In reference to conciliators being armed with "the prosecutor's pistol," Mr. Katzenbach replied:

"Maybe it's not the gun that you think it is, Senator."

"You better not repeat that out loud," Mr. Javits responded.

Senator Abraham A. Ribicoff, Democrat of Connecticut who is the subcommittee chairman, brought up the current dispute between the Attorney General and Texas officials and asked if such a controversy might not hamper conciliation efforts in which the Justice Department was directly involved.

Texas officials accused Mr. Katzenbach yesterday of interfering in state affairs by assigning Federal Bureau of Investigation agents to observe voter registration in that state. Mr. Katzenbach said his action was in line with a Federal Court order that had brought about a special registration.

Area Is Broadened

The Attorney General told the Senators he favored putting the service in the Commerce Department when it was created by the Civil Rights Act of 1964 because the main job of the service was then believed to be the bringing about of peaceful integration of public accommodations in the South.

Since then, he said, racial problems have sprung up throughout the nation.

"The expanding range of the service's activities has brought it more and more often into areas in which the Department of Justice has a direct enforcement responsibility," he said.

"Conciliation is an old friend. Indeed, it has always been the function of the law and the good lawyer to keep tempers down, to find satisfactory agreement and to settle cases, wherever possible, out of court."

Powell Reported Opposed to Program, Stalled for Weeks in the Antipoverty Agency

3/5/66

By JOSEPH A. LOFTUS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 4 — James Farmer's plan to switch from civil rights demonstrations to teaching literacy is caught on political shoals.

A project with a $780,000 grant has been held up for weeks in the Office of Economic Opportunity, the Federal antipoverty agency.

Representative Adam Clayton Powell was reported today to be opposed to the project. Mr. Powell's public position is: "No comment."

Whether Mr. Powell is personally opposed, or is simply making a tactical move to shepherd the antipoverty agency's new bill through hearings in the next two weeks, could not be determined. An aide to the Manhattan Democrat said that a number of members of Congress had privately told Mr. Powell in recent weeks of their opposition to the project.

The project first became known in December, prematurely in Mr. Farmer's view. As a result of the publicity, he felt obliged to announce then his resignation as executive director of the Congress of Racial Equality, effective March 1.

Causes of Delay Unclear

The project, called the National Cooperative Literacy Program, is to be operated by the Center for Community-Action Education. It would provide literacy classes in 18 communities, with Federal funds being used to train the instructors and to provide teaching materials.

In January, the antipoverty agency was on the verge of announcing approval of the project. That announcement has never come. The agency says the project is very much alive, but it is not possible to get a clear statement of the cause of the delay.

Mr. Powell is chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee, which manages the agency's authorization bill. The Senate Appropriations Committee, with veto power over the agency's money requests, is packed with members from the Deep South.

When Sargent Shriver, head of the antipoverty agency, is under political pressure, or expects it, he is at great pains to find all possible flaws in a proposal. Weakness that would be overlooked in noncontroversial projects are magnified in expectation of challenges at the Capitol.

White House Meeting Seeks Leaders From All Fields

NYT 3/6/66

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 5 — "The American people would like to get this problem behind them."

The speaker was Ben W. Heineman, the new chairman of the White House Conference on Civil Rights, and the problem, as defined by President Johnson, was how to make the Negro American a full partner in society.

Mr. Heineman, who also is chairman of the Chicago & North Western Railway, has set out to broaden the responsibility for finding and achieving solutions.

"I would hope the Federal Government will continue to play a major role in the whole area," he said in an interview. "But I also feel strongly that more must be done by the private sector and by the state and local governments."

This new emphasis is reflected in the make-up of a 29-member council the President has appointed to develop an agenda for the conference, which will be held here June 1 and 2.

Many Key Leaders

In addition to civil rights, government, education and labor leaders, who traditionally have been concerned with racial matters, the council includes the following:

James A. Linen 3d, president of Time, Inc.; James G. Maddox, professor of agriculture, University of North Carolina; J. Irwin Miller, chairman of Cummins Engine Company; Rafer Johnson, former Olympic decathlon champion; Courtlandt S. Gross, chairman of Lockheed Aircraft Corporation; John S. Gleason Jr., vice president of the First National Bank of Chicago, and United States District Judge A. Leon Higginbotham Jr. of Philadelphia.

A Philip Randolph, the Negro labor leader, is honorary chairman of the conference. New vice-chairmen under Mr. Heineman are the Rev. Walter E. Fauntroy, director of the Washington Bureau of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, and Edward Sylvester, director of the Labor Department's Office of Contract Compliance.

Mr. Heineman said the council would sift the many ideas made at a planning session of 250 delegates last November, consult experts in the fields involved and draw up proposals for conference action.

The conference may include as many as 2,000 delegates from all walks of life. It will come one year after President Johnson announced he would call such a session "to help the American Negro fulfill the rights which, after the long time of injustice, he is finally about to secure."

Mr. Heineman said no attempt would be made to narrow the proposals to any area. While urban problems are particularly pressing, he said, the conference will also be concerned with Negro life in the rural South.

"The whole society is not deeply enough involved," Mr. Heineman said. "I haven't any doubt at all that the American people will respond to this problem if we are able to show them how and what to do."

The regulations will not apply to the 60,000 persons now at 650 cities and towns across the work in the local programs of nation. They will apply to tens of thousands who wish to serve in the antipoverty campaign in the future.

The new guidelines, which reportedly caused mcuch friction and controversy inside the agency, headed by Sargent Shriver, are being issud this week.

On Capitol Hill, meanwhile, Secretary of Labor W. Willard Wirtz suggested an unusual approach to reducing underemployment and poverty. He proposed setting up semipublic corporations to provide jobs for people "who are not good employment risks" and to help meet the costs of transportation and other difficulties confronting such workers.

Community action programs, started and conducted locally with 90 per cent Federal funding, are by far the biggest part of the antipoverty effort. They will consume more than half of all poverty funds in the coming fiscal year and have already directly touched 2.4-million poor Americans, according to Mr. Shriver.

Previously, community action agencies had been instructed to employ only "capable and responsible personnel who are of good character and reputation," sympathetic towards the objectives of the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964, who "are not members of subversive organizations."

That directive now reads:

"Manifestations of disloyalty to the United States, membership in subversive organizations or lack of sympathy with the objectives of the Economic Opportunity Act are inconsistent with employment in a community action program. Recent conviction of a crime involving moral turpitude shall be considered strong evidence of failure to meet these standards."

The section, aimed at the governing boards of citywide community action programs, adds that no person may be banned from any board "until he has had a full and fair opportunity to hear and answer the asserted factual basis for his ineligibility at an open meeting" of the governing body.

Entitled to a Lawyer

It further states that the accused person shall be entitled to be represented by a lwyer and that the final ruling must be made by a majority of the full board.

There are 20,000 persons already serving on such governing boards in the United States, 20,000 more professional workers among the poor and 20,000 more nonprofessionals, including poor people, who serve as block workers, neighborhood center workers, health and teachers' aides.

The first two groups will expand much more slowly from now on as community action programs reach out to about 200 more communities in the fiscal year that begins next July 1, according to a spokesman for the agency. The nonprofessional group is expected at least to double in the coming year.

James F. Kelleher, deputy public affairs director, said that "hundreds of letters an questions" about hiring policy had come into the agency's headquarters here, most of them from "newly created and developed agencies that you can't expect to have sophisticated personnel systems."

An Answer to Queries

He added that the new directive simply answered all the most frequently asked questions in one mailing.

Suggestions at Hearing

Secretary of Labor Wirtz made his suggestions on reducing poverty in testimony before the House Education and Labor Committee, headed by Representative Adam Clayton Powell, Democrat of Manhattan.

Replying to Mr. Powell's demand for greater emphasis on jobs in the antipoverty program, Mr. Wirtz said'

"I suggest the committee's serious consideration of the possibility of establishing some kind of semipublic corporation which could enggage in semicommercial (but not for profit) operations which would employ workers who are not good private employment risks on enterprises which have some return but are not privately profitable.

"I also suggest consideration of a semipublic corporation which would undertake to meet the costs of transportation—and the difficulties inherent in putting together part-time jobs—which are today the difference between employment and submarginal underemployment for hundreds of thousands of America's poor."

Says Cost Would be Low

"This includes a great many domestic workers who live in slums and for whom there are jobs—12 miles away in the suburbs, and two days a week," he went on." It also includes perhaps as many as a million migrant farm workers."

"Both of these suggestions involve the possibility of substantial reductions of underemployment and poverty—at comparatively low cost," he said.

After testifying, Secretary Wirtz said that collecting scrap from the Jersey Meadows area around Newark would illustrate a kind of project in mind.

Collecting the scrap and selling it would not be worthwhile for a profit-making corporation and the Government could not do it without legislation, he said. The solution, he suggested, might be a semipublic corporation that would in effect underwrite the wages of persons who could not get jobs in private industry.

Transportation is a problem not only for part-time domestics but sometimes for full-time breadwinners, Mr. Wirtz said.

A resident of the Watts district of Los Angeles who works in Santa Monica, 11 miles away, has to ride three buses in each direction. His total travel time is about five hours daily and the cost for a low-wage worker is relatively high.

6 Leaders Meet With U.S. Aides and Decry Ghettos

By ROBERT B. SEMPLE Jr.

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 11—An angry delegation of whites and Negroes from Baltimore descended on the Department of Housing and Urban Development today to protest housing discrimination in their city.

The delegation, made up of a half-dozen leaders of the Baltimore chapter of the Congress of Racial Equality, met for about three hours in a closed session with housing agency officials.

The session, according to those present, produced much candid discussion, but no meeting of minds. The CORE delegation insisted that the agency had not used the powers it had to reduce discrimination.

The agency officials acknowledged the existence of discrimination and expressed their sympathy. But they said their authority to make significant changes in existing patterns were limited.

Letter to Weaver

The meeting was initiated by the CORE chapter in a letter last month to Robert C. Weaver, secretary of the agency. The letter said that "months of nonviolent demonstrations and negotiations to break down the walls of the Negro housing ghetto" in Baltimore had failed.

Out of "sheer desperation," the letter went on, CORE had decided to ask for a direct confrontation with housing officials to explain and dramatize their plight.

Among the charges made by the CORE group, both in the letter and the meeting, were:

The meeting was initiated by the CORE chapter in a letter last month to Robert C. Weaver, secretary of the agency. The letter said that "months of nonviolent demonstrations and negotiations to break down the walls of the Negro housing ghetto" in Baltimore had failed.

Out of "sheer desperation," the letter went on, CORE had decided to ask for a direct confrontation with housing officials to explain and dramatize their plight.

Among the charges made by the CORE group, both in the letter and the meeting, were:

¶Despite concerted efforts by civil rights groups, very few new homes or apartments outside the downtown area had been opened to Negroes, although they make up nearly 40 per cent of the city's population.

¶The only readily available supply of new housing for Negroes is public housing. But even public housing projects have become ghettos.

¶Despite President Kennedy's Executive order of November, 1962, barring discrimination in Federally assisted or insured housing, Baltimore Negroes are "completely" barred from housing insured by the Federal housing agency.

Of 17 public housing projects in the city, they said, three had "significant" racial integration, three were all-white, and eleven were all, or nearly all, Negro.

"Unless something is done now to sever the housing noose that is strangling the Negro chapter here," the delegation said, "Baltimore is certain to erupt in the same destructive way that so many other large cities have erupted in past summers."

The meeting was directed by Booker T. McGraw, special assistant to the secretary for intergroup relations. He and Dr. Weaver are Negroes.

Mr. McGraw was joined by Philip Maloney, assistant commissioner of the Federal Housing Administration; Frances Servaites, assistant commissioner of the Public Housing Administration; Howard Wharton, deputy commissioner of the Urban Renewal Administration, and several other top departmental officials.

The CORE group directed its complaints principally at Mr. Maloney, the F.H.A., and what it said was the agency's "timid" and "unnecessarily negative" interpretation of Mr. Kennedy's Executive order.

The group insisted that the order, if interpreted liberally and enforced regularly, would enable the agency to police discrimination in new housing developments built with F.H.A.-insured loans much more vigorously than it was now doing.

It also said that the order, if properly interpreted, would allow the agency to recruit Negroes and place them in new developments to insure nondiscrimination and to relieve "intolerable pressures" of the ghetto.

Agency officals said that they did not think such an interpretation of the order was possible and that their authority extended only to the "investigation" of complaints and, if necessary, the punishment of the builder involved.

White House Seeks Rights Safeguards In Broad Measure

3/17/66

By JOHN HERBERS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 16—The Administration will ask Congress to make it a Federal crime to intimidate or to harm persons engaged in the desegregation of public facilities.

The proposed law, which would not be as broad as some other bills now before Congress, would provide a graduated scale of penalties according to the severity of the crime.

The Administration will also seek to eliminate racial discrimination on juries through two courses of action.

First, Federal juries would be selected only from lists of registered voters or from other representative lists of adult residents that are approved by the appropriate judicial conference.

Second, it would be made illegal to bar persons from state and local jury panels because of race, sex or national origin. In states where there was evidence of violation, the attorney general could seek relief in a Federal court.

The court could then establish nondiscriminatory standards or appoint a master to see that discrimination was eliminated.

Congressmen and Civil Rights leaders have been told that these provisions are contained in the Administration's 1966 civil rights proposals. The proposals, which are to be combined under one bill with fair housing legislation, is ready for submission to Congress, according to members who have been briefed on them.

Except ofr fair housing, the Administration proposal is more narrow and less stringent than both the civil rights bills introduced earlier by Republicans and a bipartisan bill prepared by the Leadership Conference o Civil Rights, which represents more than 100 organizations.

However, the Justice Department has said the Government's bill for the protection of civil rights workers will be strengthened considerably if the Supreme Court acts favorably on its request to broaden two conspiracy statutes under which civil rights crimes have been prosecuted in the Federal courts.

Racial Makeup Varies

The racial composition of jury panels has varied widely from district to district in both state and Federal courts. On Federal courts the jury commissioners have employed a number of methods of selecting Panels.

Some are chosen at random from telephone books. Another method is called the "key man" system. Under this prominent citizens are asked to recommend responsible citizens for jury duty.

Under the Administration bill, prospective jurors could be chosen at random from lists of registered voters. It is believed that when ten Voting Rights Act of 1965 becomds fully effective voting lists will represent a fair cross-section of the community.

Where this is challenged, however, a judicial conference could prescribe standards to be used. The conferences are made up of judges who administer the business and rules of the court.

The present literacy requirements for Federal jurors would be permitted to stand under the Administration bill. The bipartisan bill and those introduced by Senator Jacob K. Javits of New York and other Republicans would permit illiterates to sit on cases where it was decided that the ability to read and write was not needed.

Some proposals now before Congress call for juries to be selected from the Federal census to obtain representation by all groups.

The bill is designed to open local juries to both Negroes and women in a number of states in the South. In Lowndes County, Ala., until the Federal courts intervened, jurors were drawn from a pool of about 700 white men. Women were barred by state law.

Not contained in the bill, Congressional sources said, is a key provision sought by the leadership conference and the United States Commission on Civil Rights—broad authority to transfer cases from local to Federal court when there was evidence of flagrant discrimination in the local court.

The Federal System

AJ 3/8/66

PRESIDENT Johnson has been talking vaguely about a new means of dispersing federal power, and he is expected to spell out some of his thoughts about it shortly.

He obviously has a difficult riddle to solve.

His own legislative program has created, of course, great new labyrinths of governmental activity.

Some of his programs, such as poverty, are designed in part to create some vital local leadership. But all the lines of power in the big new federal programs really end in Washington.

Is it possible, at a time when federal activity has so expanded, to disperse the power over it?

The President evidently is thinking in terms of more decision-making in regional federal offices, for one thing.

He also evidently looks to the time when federal grants can be made to states, local governments and even private agencies with less federal-level control than we are accustomed to.

That would be an admirable goal at a time when federal power, of necessity, will continue to increase greatly.

The federal system has been severely tried during the past few years because of racial change. A large part of the South for a long time openly rejected the one principle of a federal system that cannot be rejected: the ultimate supremacy of the federal constitution, as construed by the federal courts.

Because of this new kind of civil war, the sort of federal-state comity that is necessary in a working federal system of divided powers was greatly strained. When even a governor renounces the federal system, as governors of several Southern states have done at various times, working federalism is obviously disrupted.

Federal lines of power then are tightened. Right now we are seeing them pulled tighter than they should have to be pulled, in the case of school desegregation. But here was an instance in which, after 12 years, a large area still had not assumed local responsibility of the kind necessary for working federalism; and so the federal reins pull tighter.

We will have to get over the dying throes of this rebellion before working federalism can be restored. As long as state and local officials provoke tighter federal control, we cannot have looser federal control.

How we can have it, even without this problem, remains to be seen. Mr. Johnson has, certainly, a difficult riddle to solve.

PRESIDENT BACKED ON RIGHTS IN HOUSE

Community Service Will Go to Justice Department

By JOHN D. MORRIS
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, April 20—The House sustained President Johnson on a civil rights issue today by approving his proposal for transfer of the Community Relations Service from the Department of Commerce to the Department of Justice.

The vote was 220 to 163. The Senate approved the plan,on April 6 by a vote of 42 to 32.

The House action cleared the way for the transfer to take place as scheduled on Friday.

President Johnson proposed Senate approved the plan on the shift in a message to Congress last February. He said it enlarged scope to our efforts to ease racial tension."

He added:

"Placing the Community Relations Service within the Justice Department will enhance the ability of the Justice Department to mediate and conciliate and will insure that the Federal Government speaks with a unified voice in these tense situations where the good offices of the Federal Government are called upon to assist."

The Community Relations Service was created by the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Its assigned function is to work quietly at the community level to mediate racial differences.

When President Johnson first proposed its transfer, some civil rights spokesmen strongly objected on the ground that the agency was likely to be downgraded.

The feeling was that the agency might be submerged in so large a department and that its stature and effectiveness might thus be impaired.

However, the President apparently convinced most of them that their fears were unwarranted. His recent appointment of Roger W. Wilkins as director of the agency did much to appease them. The director's father is Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Reuss Backs Shift

Representative Henry S. Reuss, Democrat of Wisconsin, called the proposed shift a "very simple and straightforward" way to improve coordination of Federal civil rights activities. He said one effect would be to upgrade, rather than downgrade, the agency's "important function of conciliation."

The opposition was led by Republicans, who contended that effective coordination already existed. They suggested that conciliation would be handicapped by the agency's attachment to a department responsible for law enforcement.

Representative Robert P. Griffin, Republican of Michigan, recalled that President Kennedy had sought to insure "an atmosphere free of coercion" for conciliation and mediation activities of the Community Relations Service. This "important principle" would be eroded, Mr. Griffin argued, by its transfer to the Justice Department, which also includes the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

The house vote, like that in the Senate, came on a Rpublican-sponsored motion to disapprove a Presidential reorganization plan providing for the transfer. Under the Reorganization Act of 1949, reorganization plans go into effect automatically unless vetoed by either the House or the Senate.

Head of Poverty Unit Resigns, Charging a Lack of Planning

Helen Harris Leaves Post as Chairman of Group That Screens Proposals

By JOHN KIFNER

Helen M. Harris resigned yesterday as chairman of the city's screening board for antipoverty proposals, charging that "the situation has deteriorated well past the point where I can hope to retrieve it, and my usefulness is at an end."

Miss Harris, who is executive director of United Neighborhood Houses, resigned as chairman of the Committee on Planning and Coordination of the Council Against Poverty. In a letter to former Welfare Commissioner James R. Dumpson, chairman of the council, she was sharply critical of the operation of the antipoverty program.

"The truth of the matter is the committee is neither planning nor coordinating — nor can it," Miss Harris wrote. She said there was a lack of information about the problems of impoverished areas, a staff insufficient for helping local groups in making proposals, a failure to coordinate efforts with city and Federal authorities, and a feeling of immobilization because of the impending reorganization of the program.

Neither Sidney Gardner, executive secretary of the Council Against Poverty, nor Anne M. Roberts, executive director of the Economic Opportunity Council, had any comment.

Second Such Departure

Miss Harris was the second head of a private welfare agency to resign from an antipoverty post in recent weeks. Mrs. Randolph Guggenheimer, chairman of the Day Care Council of New York, resigned on April 4 as co-chairman of the city's Project Head Start committee in protest at what she called the "chaos" in the program.

Miss Harris, a social worker since her graduation from Bryn Mawr in 1917, will remain as a member of the Council Against Poverty and of its executive committee.

The council is the policymaking body of the city's antipoverty program. Its planning and coordinating committee is responsible for helping local agencies develop proposals for programs.

"To plan responsibly," Miss Harris wrote in part, "we should have at our disposal a map and a profile of every poverty area, with all the most up-to-date pertinent facts concerning its population, the extent and character of its poverty, its housing, its unemployment by age groups, its incidence of school dropouts and its resources, both public and private," as well as "reports on the status of all antipoverty efforts in the area."

The New York Times Studio
Helen M. Harris

"As it is now," her letter went on, "with few exceptions, the committee considers each project on its merits, but in a vacuum, sometimes giving approval to really questionable proposals simply because they are in what appears to be a sparsely served area or because heavy pressure is brought to bear.

"In other cases, projects which may be potentially useful in breaking the poverty cycle are delayed because of the inability of the small antipoverty staff to help prospective sponsors develop proposals that will have a chance of acceptance in Washington," Miss Harris said.

She said that despite repeated requests, "the council has not set guidelines and priorities for the committee, nor has it provided the additional staff," and that this had led to "waning interest on the part of many committee members, irregular attendance and a lack of consistency in decision-making."

In her letter, Miss Harris said that lack of coordination between the council and the Antipoverty Operations Board "aggravates an already chaotic situation."

She recommended a complete reorganization, with "adequate staffing, as the first priority, and comprehensive planning as the second."

"The staff as a whole," she said "is far too small and pressures upon them from every segment of the community have been monumental, with unreasonable deadlines set by Washington and ground rules changing like shifting sands. The miracle is that so much has been accomplished."

Miss Harris, who has been on the committee for more than a year, became chairman last Jan. 1.

Many Think Too Much of His Effort Is Restricted to Problems in the South

5/2/66 NYT

WASHINGTON, May 1—Despite the breadth and eloquence of President Johnson's latest civil rights message, many observers believe the Administration has yet to come to grips with the major, more controversial issues in race relations. These include de facto segregation, the inferiority of many slum schools and the alleged use of public funds to worsen rather than alleviate the problems of the ghetto.

News Analysis

In short, the Government's efforts in civil rights is largely a regional one, with its programs and resources concentrated in the South. The Administration however, has embarked on making a shift in emphasis politically feasible by involving a wider spectrum of the American society in what the President called "a great adventure as great as that of the last century, when our fathers marched to the Western frontier."

"Our frontier today is of human beings, not of land," Mr. Johnson said in his message to Congress last Thursday.

Whether the nation succeeds in conquering that frontier, he said, "is an issue that rests in the heart of every American . . . in our common willingness" to secure equal opportunity and achievement for the Negro American.

The White House Conference on Civil Rights, which will bring 2,000 delegates to Washington June 1, is being shaped to capture hearts as much as it is to draft bold proposals for action.

Ben W. Heineman, chairman of the Chicago & North Western Railway who will be chairman of the conference, is calling for delegates from every important segment and interest in society. This will be in sharp contrast to the planning conference last fall that was made up largely of those having a direct interest in civil rights.

The June conference will deal with the burning issues.

Civil rights leaders believe that the proposals President Johnson sent to Congress barely touched the fringes. The bulk of them amounted to a mopping-up operation against overt discrimination in the South, a supplement to the large body of laws that have been passed in recent years affecting that region.

He called for jury reform, stronger Federal laws against racial crimes and intimidation and additional authority for the Justice Department to proceed in the courts against school segregation.

Only one proposal is national in scope—the ban on discrimination in housing. Even if the bill passes, which is highly doubtful, it will not help Negroes in the slums.

The bill calls for relief through the courts. Voluntary compliance with the law and the right to go to court would help Negroes with means. But much stronger state laws than the proposed Federal ones have made little impact on the slums, where the gravest problems lie. Negroes there suffer much more than racial discrimination.

In its recent hearings in Cleveland, the United States Commission on Civil Rights heard some sobering testimony. A Negro youth said he had never met a white boy until he was 14 years old — and all he knew of whites was their reputed cruelty. A psychiatrist who examined slum children said he had found them surprisingly bitter, cynical and discouraged at an early age.

The commission said it had found that Federal rograms such as urban renewal and public welfare had been perverted so that they actually degraded and worsened conditions of Negroes living in the Cleveland slums.

Yet the Government's civil rights efforts are not directed to these children but confined almost entirely to the South.

Because of political pressure, the Office of Education has backed off its once firm intention to move against de facto segregation under the fund withholding provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice, which contains almost 100 lawyers, is concerned almost exclusively with Southern problems.

There has been a consensus for "making over" the South, and this has met with some success. But there seems to be no clear consensus for "making over" institutions and attitudes that shape life in the slums, North and South.

The proposed fair housing legislation, even with its limited applicability, faced difficult opposition. A Democratic Congressman from a large Northern city said many members with strong civil rights records would find it hard to vote for this one.

Proposals to be considered by the White House Conference are much more controversial. For example, the council that has been drafting an agenda has been talking of legislation that would make it illegal for a landlord to make a profit on slum property. Council members say that present Great Society programs, even if extended, are timid and inadequate.

WASHINGTON, May 2—A group of university professors, lawyers and leaders of private foundations and associations has issued a report saying the administration of Federal civil rights laws is inadequate in many respects.

It said, among other things, that the Johnson Administration's efforts at enforcement had been damaged by decentralization among agencies and that the Government faced a "crisis of credibility" in respect to its intention to enforce the fund-withholding provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

The report is the consensus of a conference on civil rights legislation and administration held at the University of Notre Dame Law School in February. It is scheduled for publication in the June issue of The Notre Dame Lawyer.

Participants included some of the leading theorists and intellectuals in the civil rights field. The conference was directed by Joseph O'Meara, dean of the law school.

Scathing Criticism

The most scathing criticism concerned the enforcement of Title VI of the act, which is intended to ban racial discrimination in an federally assisted program.

Last December, Attorney General Nicholas deB. Katzenbach issued guidelines intended to aid departments and agencies in enforcement of Title VI in a wide range of Federal programs. This set of guidelines, the report said, "thwarts Congressional intent and threatens to destroy he effeciveness of Title VI."

The main fault, the report said, is that the guidelines refer to termination or withholding of funds because of discrimination as a last resort or "ultimate sanction" and look to bringing of lawsuits as the normal method of enforcement.

The main fault, the report said, is that the guidelines refer to termination or withholding of funds because of discrimination as a last resort or "ultimate sanction" and look to bringing of lawsuits as the normal method of enforcement.

"Cutting off Federal assistance becomes an 'atom bomb' which must not be used," the report said.

"The Federal Government currently faces a serious crisis of credibility with respect to its intention to enforce Title VI by terminating assistance. The Attorney General's guidelines have exacerbated doubts that the Administration has the political will and determination to give Title VI its intended effect."

Congress Intention Cited

Congress, the report said, did not intend that a judicial determination should be a condition for cutting off Federal assistance.

"This is not what the long struggle for Title VI is all about," the report said. "Litigation has not proved to be a suitable weapon to effectuate speedy, wholesale desegregation. Congress thought that the threat to cut off Federal assistance would be. Litigation policy must serve to make this threat credible."

The group said school desegregation under Title VI had moved at a "sluggish pace" and the Administration had made little effort to use it in federally assisted housing programs and other activities.

Enforcement of civil rights laws and executive orders was decentralized last September when President Johnson abolished the President's Committee on Equal Opportunity, headed by Vice President Humphrey.

"Only the President himself has the official responsibility to see civil rights problems as 'all of a piece' and act upon this insight," the report said. "We are concerned that existing arrangements seem inadequate to assist the President in performing this duty. Some additional coordinating authority, responsible directly to the President and independent of the operating agencies and departments, is essential."

The report said the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, the independent agency established by the 1964 Civil Rights Act, should be transferred to the Department of Labor and its work coordinated with other Government efforts to end racial discrimination in employment practices.

Recent transfer of the Community Relations Service, a conciliation agency, from the Commerce Department to the Justice Department should not be regarded as permanent, the report said.

Proposals for White House Conference Are Readied

WASHINGTON, May 21—The nation may soon see a conference composed largely of the middle class approving a group of far-reaching social proposals put together by a railroad magnate who considers the proposals "equitable and too long deferred."

This is the outlook for the long-awaited White House Conference on Civil Rights to be held here June 1 and 2.

Invitations have gone out to 2,400 Americans who are said to represent a cross-section of society. On Monday, these 2,400 persons will be mailed copies of the proposals drafted by a 29-member council with the help of leading scholars across the country.

Optimistic Engineer

At the conference, every delegate will be given a chance to speak out on any proposal, on or off the agenda, and whatever consensus is reached will be transmitted to President Johnson, to state and local governments and to a wide range of private interests for possible implementation.

This ambitious attempt to involve the total society in the Negro revolution was engineered by the chairman of the Chicago & North Western Railway, Ben W. Heineman, who was named chairman of the conference last February.

"If I were not an optimist," Mr. Heineman said in an interview, "I would not be in the railroad business. I am hopeful that in two, three or five years we can look back and say, 'This was a point of departure.'"

Optimistic Engineer

At the conference, every delegate will be given a chance to speak out on any proposal, on or off the agenda, and whatever consensus is reached will be transmitted to President Johnson, to state and local governments and to a wide range of private interests for possible implementation.

This ambitious attempt to involve the total society in the Negro revolution was engineered by the chairman of the Chicago & North Western Railway, Ben W. Heineman, who was named chairman of the conference last February.

"If I were not an optimist," Mr. Heineman said in an interview, "I would not be in the railroad business. I am hopeful that in two, three or five years we can look back and say, 'This was a point of departure.'"

The proposals, which will be made public on Tuesday, are said to be rather advanced. They cover four broad categories—administration of justice, education, housing, and economic security and welfare. They range from breaking up the slums to assimilating rural Negroes in the South.

They call for action by the Federal, state and local governments, the business community, educational institutions and others in the private sector.

All Called "Equitable"

A spokesman said the proposals call for "sizable expenditures" of money. Economic security is approached from the point of view that every person is entitled to hold a job and if that is not available the person should receive public assistance.

Mr. Heineman was asked if the proposals could be implemented within the present American system.

"There are none I do not regard as equitable and too long deferred," he said. "I would be glad to see them in effect."

The conference was first proposed by President Johnson a year ago in an address at Howard University. He said it should find ways "to help the American Negro fulfill the rights which, after the long time of injustice, he is finally about to secure" through civil rights legislation.

At the November planning session, attended largely by persons directly involved with civil rights, a great number of law proposals were advanced, but about the only consensus was a protest against the way civil rights laws were being administered.

When Mr. Heineman took over, his first act was to appoint a council to draw up an agenda for the June meeting. Council members ranged from John Lewis, the recently ousted chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, to James A. Linen 3d, president of Time, Inc.

The council has met in Washington on weekends for three months and Mr. Heineman said attendance had been "excellent." Study groups, composed largely of university specialists, were appointed to conduct research and to analyze the problems. The proposals grew out of this study.

One thing that has concerned planners is the possibility that the conference could erupt in disorder or turn into another protest against the Administration. Mr. Heineman said he was confident the session would be "thoughtful, dispassionate and rational."

WASHINGTON, May 24 — The White House Conference on Civil Rights, to be held June 1 and 2, will be asked to approve a multibillion-dollar program to give the Negro "true equality" without disturbing the Federal system or private enterprise.

The recommendations, made public today, are contained in a 100-page report submitted to the 2,400 conference delegates by a 29-member council named by President Johnson last February to draw up an agenda.

WASHINGTON, May 24 — The White House Conference on Civil Rights, to be held June 1 and 2, will be asked to approve a multibillion-dollar program to give the Negro "true equality" without disturbing the Federal system or private enterprise.

The recommendations, made public today, are contained in a 100-page report submitted to the 2,400 conference delegates by a 29-member council named by President Johnson last February to draw up an agenda.

Despite the breadth and cost of the proposals, the chairman of the conference, Ben W. Heineman, a railroad executive, said he considered them all attainable goals and not "pie in the sky." However, he said their enactment would involve the total society, not just the Federal Government.

Goal Is Achievement

The purpose of the conference, as announced by the President a year ago, is to help Negro Americans "move beyond opportunity to achievement" and dissolve remaining barriers that have kept them "a people apart."

The major recommendations include:

¶Sweeping new public works projects that would attempt to provide employment for all at their existing levels of skills. For those still unable to work or find jobs, there should be a guaranteed level of income provided under uniform, Federal standards.

¶Federalization of public employment agencies to make jobs available without regard to regional boundaries.

¶Adoption of a national minimum of welfare assistance to furnish a standard of living "compatible with health and decency."

¶Equalization of the education effort among states and districts throughout the nation "so that our schools provide for all children what is now provided for the fortunate few." The average expenditure for each pupil should be raised from $533 to $1,000 a year as a "reasonable goal."

¶Affirmative action at every level "to break down the walls of segregation" in public schools.

¶Assurance that every citizen will have the right to higher education.

¶Large-scale construction of low-cost, integrated housing to "revitalize the ghetto" and to disperse people from the slums through a total revamping of present methods.

Although the recommendations went far beyond the Great Society legislation on the books and before Congress, the Council made it clear that the chief burden for achievement of the goals laid outside the realm of Federal Government.

"In our diverse society," the report said, "it is the citizen who leads. It is to this mobilization of spirit, commitment and resources that we must address ourselves."

"The national Government's response to the compelling cry of the Negro American for justice and true equality has not been matched by the state and local government, by business and labor, the housing industry, educational institutions, and the wide spectrum of voluntary organizations who, through united effort, have the power to improve our society," the report continued.

"In the struggle for equality, we must now move to new and different battlefields in every city and its suburbs, in rural areas, and in every state."

Ben W. Heineman, chairman of the Chicago & North Western Railway, who is the conference chairman, said at a news conference here that the delegates invited to attend represented "every shade of opinion" ranging between the Ku Klux Klan and the Black Muslims.

He said those two groups were not invited because they did not prescribe to the purpose for which the conference was called—the assimilation of Negro Americans.

Mr. Heineman said he regretted that the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, the most militant of the national civil rights organizations, had withdrawn from the conference.

However, he said that poor and unorganized Negroes would be represented.

In order to assure their representation, he continued, members of the Council had contributed money to two foundations to provide for travel and living expenses for those who could not afford to pay their way.

A Broad Representation

The Council like the conference, contains broad representation. Its members range from men like James A. Linen 3d, president of Time, Inc., to John Lewis, the recently ousted chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.

Mr. Lewis attended a majority of the meetings in which the recommendations were adopted. One reason for his replacement on the student group, according to informed sources, is that the organization, which works largely among the poor in the South, is moving toward black nationalism.

Mr. Heineman, who answered questions with the crispness of an executive at a stockholders' meeting, would not say what security precautions were being made to prevent an outbreak of violence or disruption by civil rights militants who believed the Johnson Administration to be insincere in its efforts to help Negroes.

Another spokesman for the conference, however, said "regular White House security" would be arranged because Vice President Humphrey is expected to address the opening session and the President is likely to speak at its conclusion.

The conference will adopt no resolutions nor vote on any proposal. Delegates will be divided into several sections where each recommendation will be discussed and where each delegate will be free to make recommendations on his own.

After the conference, the Council will take transcripts of all the sessions and draft a report to the President.

Mr. Heineman said this procedure was adopted by unanimous consent of the Council in order to keep the conferen from bogging down parliamentary quarrels.

It is expected that the fin report to the President will ge erally follow the recommend tions released today.

The Council pointed out tha many proposals were being su mitted because, as Mr. Johns said last year, the problem confronting Negroes constitut "a seamless web." For this re son, Mr. Heineman said, no of the proposals were give priority.

The report, however, seem to put special emphasis on en ployment. It pointed out th even in today's booming eco omy the unemployment rate f Negroes was about 7 per cent more than twice the average f the whites. For Negro youth between 16 and 19 years old, said, unemployment is "nothin less than catastrophic, ave aging more than 30 per cent f girls and 25 per cent for ma teen-agers in 1965."

Billions In Negro Aid Asked

WASHINGTON — The White House Conference on Civil Rights to be held June 1 and 2 will be asked to approve a multi-billion dollar program to give the Negro "true equality" without disturbing the federal system of free private enterprise.

The recommendations, made public Tuesday, are contained in a 100-page report submitted to 2,400 conference delegates by a 29-member council named by President Lyndon B. Johnson last February to draw up an agenda.

Despite the breadth and cost of the proposals, the chairman of the conference, Ben W. Heineman, a railroad executive, said he considered them attainable goals and not "pie in the sky." However, he added, their enactment would involve the total society, not just the federal government.

HELP TO ACHIEVE

The purpose of the conference, as announced by the President one year ago, is to help Negro Americans "move beyond opportunity to achievement" and dissolve remaining barriers that have kept them "a people apart."

Essentially, the recommendations are an effort to involve the nation in a comprehensive, ambitious effort to bring the Negro into the center of American life without disturbing the system of federalism, private initiative and enterprise.

HUGE COSTS

As expected, they call for federal spending programs that go far beyond the Great Society legislation on the books and before Congress. An example is a massive new public works effort that would attempt to provide employment for all at their existing level of skill.

For those still unable to work or find jobs, the report said, there should be a guaranteed level of income provided under uniform, federal standards.

Excerpts From Rights Council's Recommendations

5/25/66

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 24—Following are excerpts from the recommendations of the Council of the White House Conference on Civil Rights, which will be held June 1-2:

ECONOMIC SECURITY AND WELFARE

There is no single, simple or quick solution for the economic problems of Negroes but nothing less than a broad, based "crash" program can significantly improve the life-chances of hundreds of thousands of Negro Americans now trapped in joblessness and poverty.

I. Establish metropolitan jobs councils in all major urban areas.

Metropolitan jobs councils should be established in each major urban area with a substantial Negro population. Membership should include organized labor, metropolitan government, education and training institutions and other appropriate community organizations.

II. Create a rural jobs task force.

The council recommends the appointment of an emergency rural jobs task force whose first report, with action recommedations, should be due no later than Sept. 1. Local and regional rural jobs councils will be needed to implement the action program.

III. Develop a comprehensive human resource program.

The recommendation will provide a flexible basis for creative action; serve as a guide in developing new manpower, economic, or related legislation; help to alert local and national planners to emerging problems or trends, and provide guidelines for manpower program actions by business, organized labor, local and state governments and other agencies.

IV. Develop guaranteed jobs programs.

providing equal employment opportunities and to reduce employment prejudice and discrimination.

VII. Initiate and reinforce supportive services.

There is a crucial need to make available occupational training and related basic and remedial education to help prepare jobless Negroes for employment. There is also a need for training to upgrade employed Negroes who are working below their skill potentials.

There is a need to federalize the public employment service.

VIII. Strengthen income maintenance and labor standards programs.

The strengthening of income and labor standards programs is of special importance for Negroes, who are heavily concentrated in occupations and industries which pay low wages, provide only intermittent employment, and are excluded from protective labor standards legislation.

IX. Restructure public assistance and related welfare programs.

The nation's welfare programs fail to provide welfare recipients and other impoverished people with maximum opportunity to move from dependency to self-sustaining employment.

The Federal Government should establish and enforce national standards.

State and local governments and community organizations should make available supplemental services to needy people; consumer education, legal assistance, vocational and personal counseling, health information, home management services, free family planning services, day-care centers for working mothers, and expanded school lunch programs.

HOUSING

For 15 million Negroes congested slums have constituted their homes and ghettoed isolation has been their environment. In housing, as also duction of new houses to 2,000,000 units per year is urged.

The rent supplement bill as submitted to Congress in 1965 is strongly endorsed as a model until a more comprehensive program can be devised.

The Department of Housing and Urban Development should request funds necessary for a vastly enlarged program of research and development in housing and urban development.

Consultation of experts on all aspects of community development and housing should be called.

F.H.A. 221 (D) (3) below-market interest program, which benefits moderate-income families, requires greatly increased funding.

The authorization of federally chartered rural housing development corporations to build homes in rural areas for either the elderly or for agricultural labor, migrant or otherwise, is urged.

A housing industry program, patterned after the plans for progress program in employment, should be launched under the leadership of the President.

III. Suburban communities and new towns.

The Federal Government bears a large share of the responsibility for the dual market—new housing in the suburbs for white families with sufficient incomes, and old housing in the central city for Negroes regardless of their incomes.

Federal assistance to any local governmental unit should be conditioned on the submission of a metropolitan-wide plan providing for the desegregation of housing and promotion of communities inclusive of all races and incomes.

In areas in which local governing bodies are not meeting their responsibility to provide housing for all segments of the population, the nonwhite and the poor, the Federal Government should take direct action to provide the housing needed.

In housing, as also

Federal courts, the Congress, and the executive branches have made almost no affirmative contribution to solving problems of de facto segregation in the North and West, which has become more, rather than less rigid.

State governments have defaulted in their obligation to achieve adequate and equal educational opportunity for all.

I. Equalizing educational investment.

The present average of per pupil public expenditure is $533. A reasonable goal would be $1,000 per child.

States must commit themselves to a public policy of equalization, educate their citizens on revenue needs, and devise formulas in allocation of financial and human resources that will remedy past inequities.

Individual local school districts must also take the initiative in achieving equality of educational opportunity.

The Federal Government should increase the allocations under Title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act.

II. Reduction of racial concentration.

The Federal Government should proclaim that it is national policy to reduce racial concentration in the schools — racial concentration of pupils, teachers, and other school personnel.

Proposals to deal with problems of de facto segregation should not eclipse the size of the job still to be done to eliminate the dual system prevailing in the South.

The Federal Government should enlarge the scope of present provisions for demonstration centers.

Specific efforts must be made to promote integration in teacher and other school personnel assignments.

The sanctions already enacted in the Civil Rights Act of 1964 are failing in their purpose and must be strengthened.

It is time that the burden of desegregating the Southern schools be removed from the Negro rights or aid others in the exercise of such rights.

The threat to the personal security and rights of Negroes and civil rights workers in the South warrants the attention of the country and the Congress. There must be adequate Federal protection for those asserting Federal rights.

There is a need to secure equal justice for Negroes in the South. Negro citizens and civil rights workers must be free to exercise their constitutional rights free from harassment, intimidation and discrimination by courts, court officials, law enforcement agents, and unfairly selected juries.

Police-minority group community relations is an urban problem most pronounced in the North and West but with grave implications for the entire nation. Positive steps must be taken to deal with them. Fairer and more professional police departments will be far more able to cope with the rising incidence of street crime.

I. Protection of Negroes and civil rights workers from intimidation.

There should be broad support of Title V of the Administration's civil rights bill, which would provide greater Federal protection to Negroes and civil rights workers from intimidation.

Legislation should be enacted giving persons who suffer physical injury or property loss as the result of exercising rights protected by the criminal provisions of Title V, or as the result of urging or aiding others to exercise such rights, an opportunity to receive compensation for the injury or loss.

Any county, Government, city government, or other local government entity that employes officers who deprive persons of rights should be jointly liable with the officers to persons who suffer injury or loss from such officers' misconduct.

More Federal agents should be made available to increase the effective enforcement of civil rights laws.

or a solution for the economic problems of Negroes but nothing less than a broad, based "crash" program can significantly improve the life-chances of hundreds of thousands of Negro Americans now trapped in joblessness and poverty.

I. Establish metropolitan jobs councils in all major urban areas.

Metropolitan jobs councils should be established in each major urban area with a substantial Negro population. Membership should include organized labor, metropolitan government, education and training institutions and other appropriate community organizations.

II. Create a rural jobs task force.

The council recommends the appointment of an emergency rural jobs task force whose first report, with action recommedations, should be due no later than Sept. 1. Local and regional rural jobs councils will be needed to implement the action program.

III. Develop a comprehensive human resource program.

The recommendation will provide a flexible basis for creative action; serve as a guide in developing new manpower, economic, or related legislation; help to alert local and national planners to emerging problems or trends, and provide guidelines for manpower program actions by business, organized labor, local and state governments and other agencies.

IV. Develop guaranteed jobs programs.

Jobs must be provided without delay to solve the Negro unemployment crisis. And these jobs must be made available for Negroes at their existing level of skill attainment.

The tasks assigned to workers on a proposed government employment program, far from being "make work," are essential to fill the very real and pressing needs for public works and services that have accompanied population growth, urbanization, and increasing demands on the nation's physical resources.

V. Mount year-round programs for Negro youth.

Young Negroes need especially intensive vocational counseling to determine their best occupational prospects, and to plan the most effective educational and training programs tailored to their individual needs.

VI. Affirmative actions by private employers, labor organizations, and Government to provide more and better jobs.

Employers need to look, think, and act beyond simple nondiscrimination and pro forma or passive equal employment opportunity programs. Active and deliberate efforts to increase and improve jobs for Negroes are necessary. The Government itself needs to become a model employer in every respect and set the example for affirmative action. State and local governments should also become model employers.

Management must devote as much thought and effort to this as it does to other major functions of administration.

Labor organizations have failed to take affirmative action commensurate with the problems faced by Negro job seekers.

Churches, educational institutions, health and welfare groups, and associations can undertake affirmative action through technical assistance and through the example of their own practices.

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 should be strengthened by expanding its coverage, authorizing "cease and desist" orders, and providing back pay to persons suffering financial loss.

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission's technical assistance and education programs should be greatly expanded to help employers, labor unions, and others develop capabilities for a need for training to upgrade employed Negroes who are working below their skill potentials.

There is a need to federalize the public employment service.

VIII. Strengthen income maintenance and labor standards programs.

The strengthening of income and labor standards programs is of special importance for Negroes, who are heavily concentrated in occupations and industries which pay low wages, provide only intermittent employment, and are excluded from protective labor standards legislation.

IX. Restructure public assistance and related welfare programs.

The nation's welfare programs fail to provide welfare recipients and other impoverished people with maximum opportunity to move from dependency to self-sustaining employment.

The Federal Government should establish and enforce national standards.

State and local governments and community organizations should make available supplemental services to needy people; consumer education, legal assistance, vocational and personal counseling, health information, home management services, free family planning services, day-care centers for working mothers, and expanded school lunch programs.

HOUSING

For 15 million Negroes congested slums have constituted their homes and ghettoed isolation has been their environment. In housing, as elsewhere, there have been and continue to be two Americas.

The only program aimed at their housing needs was low-rent public housing. After nearly 30 years, however, that program has accounted for only 1 per cent of the nation's housing inventory.

I. Freedom of choice—the open market.

A firm and vigorous policy on the part of the Administration to utilize all the programs and resources of the Department of Housing and Urban Development and other agencies to promote and implement equal opportunity and desegregation is needed.

Enforcement under the executive order and Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 must be more affirmative and vigorous.

A comprehensive Federal antidiscrimination law is urgently recommended.

State licensing authorities should require that all licensed brokers, builders, etc., show that they are serving the entire public without distinction as to race as a condition of the issuance or reissuance of the license.

The National Association of Real Estate Boards (N.A.R.E.B.), the National Home Builders Association, the several banking and saving and loan associations, and insurance companies engaged in housing finance, are urged to adopt and prominently publish policy statements advocating equal opportunity in housing guaranteed by law.

N.A.R.E.B. and all state and local real estate boards are urged to admit all licensed real estate brokers of all races to membership.

Fair housing councils or their equivalent should be organized in every urban area. Housing information and service centers should be established at convenient locations in each urban area.

II. Housing Supply for Low- and moderate-income families.

More that one million new houses per year are required to take care of the housing needs of the expanding population. At least half, preferably more, of the new stock should be made available to low- and moderate-income families.

The Federal Government should invest as extensively in promoting research and development in housing as it has in, for example, agriculture.

Federal legislation designed to increase the rate of program of research and development in housing and urban development.

Consultation of experts on all aspects of community development and housing should be called.

F.H.A. 221 (D) (3) below-market interest program, which benefits moderate-income families, requires greatly increased funding.

The authorization of federally chartered rural housing development corporations to build homes in rural areas for either the elderly or for agricultural labor, migrant or otherwise, is urged.

A housing industry program, patterned after the plans for progress program in employment, should be launched under the leadership of the President.

III. Suburban communities and new towns.

The Federal Government bears a large share of the responsibility for the dual market—new housing in the suburbs for white families with sufficient incomes, and old housing in the central city for Negroes regardless of their incomes.

Federal assistance to any local governmental unit should be conditioned on the submission of a metropolitan-wide plan providing for the desegregation of housing and promotion of communities inclusive of all races and incomes.

In areas in which local governing bodies are not meeting their responsibility to provide housing for all segments of the population, the nonwhite and the poor, the Federal Government should take direct action to provide the housing needed.

In locating, transferring or expanding governmental agencies, departments, and other operations, the Federal Government should require racial and income inclusiveness of the community.

H.U.D. should be empowered to purchase, lease, and sell land to assure that its development and occupancy, now and in the future, will provide housing, facilities and services for persons of all races and incomes.

Local public housing authorities should be enabled to function on a metropolitan basis.

State governments should either regulate the zoning activities of municipal and township governments, establish state land banks for housing purposes, or create district authorities to reserve land in all parts of each metropolitan area for housing for lower-income families.

State governments should create housing development corporations comparable to the industrial development corporations which have come into common use in recent years.

IV. Revitalizing and integrating the Ghetto.

Thirty years of public housing experience and 15 of urban renewal have taught us that the problems of the American slums are far too huge and complex to submit to the piecemeal, uncoordinated attacks of separately conceived and administered programs.

The elimination of the segregation pattern of residence from the American urban scene, the affirmative implementation of equal choice and freedom of movement for all Americans and the revitalization of existing ghetto areas should be made the cornerstone of Federal housing policy.

The proposed demonstration cities program is strongly endorsed in its principle and its general design.

A realistic plan for promoting racial desegregation in the city and metropolitan community should be a basic and mandatory element of all workable programs for urban renewal.

The practice of locating large public housing projects in areas of racial concentration must be changed.

EDUCATION

More than 90 per cent of our children are educated in racially segregated schools. Segregated Negro schools, almost without exception, are inferior in quality to white schools.

I. Equalizing educational investment.

The present average of per pupil public expenditure is $533. A reasonable goal would be $1,000 per child.

States must commit themselves to a public policy of equalization, educate their citizens on revenue needs, and devise formulas in allocation of financial and human resources that will remedy past inequities.

Individual local school districts must also take the initiative in achieving equality of educational opportunity.

The Federal Government should increase the allocations under Title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act.

II. Reduction of racial concentration.

The Federal Government should proclaim that it is national policy to reduce racial concentration in the schools — racial concentration of pupils, teachers, and other school personnel.

Proposals to deal with problems of de facto segregation should not eclipse the size of the job still to be done to eliminate the dual system prevailing in the South.

The Federal Government should enlarge the scope of present provisions for demonstration centers.

Specific efforts must be made to promote integration in teacher and other school personnel assignments.

The sanctions already enacted in the Civil Rights Act of 1964 are failing in their purpose and must be strengthened.

It is time that the burden of desegregating the Southern schools be removed from the Negro parents and children where it now resides, and placed squarely as the responsibility of school boards and administrators.

III. Quality education for all.

Communities must realize that built-in inequities cannot be compensated for by an effort of a year or two, in effect shaking an educational Aerosol can over our nation's slums.

Individuals and organizations, school boards and school administrators, civil rights groups and government officials, private foundations and other private resources must take on the hard task of reorganizing local education to establish flexible, healthy educational centers that belong to the community and to the children.

School boards must, as far as possible, be constituted so as to support a policy of equal opportunity, reduction of racial concentration, and improvement in the quality of education.

Consideration should be given to a major reorganization of the school system.

School systems should make kindergarten a regular part of the school program in the many areas where it does not now exist, with curriculum, teacher-pupil ratios, and enrichments patterned after successful experimental programs.

Rural communities need to investigate curricular innovations which will prepare their children not only for probable migration elsewhere, but for different kinds of vocational and technical skills.

Vocational education has not kept pace with the rapid changes in technology and work, and has not involved sufficiently the efforts of industry, labor, schools, agencies and organizations to make it relevant.

Negro students in present agricultural programs have little opportunity to participate in work experience in local agri-business.

Two years of postsecondary education should be made available at public expense for all high school graduates.

Predominately Negro colleges should be adequately supported and strengthened.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

Effective legislative and executive measures are needed to combat the deplorable condition, found in some parts of the Deep South, where Americans are murdered, beaten, and subject to other forms of intimidation because they exercise constitutional or other Federal civil rights free to exercise their constitutional rights free from harassment, intimidation and discrimination by courts, court officials, law enforcement agents, and unfairly selected juries.

Police-minority group community relations is an urban problem most pronounced in the North and West but with grave implications for the entire nation. Positive steps must be taken to deal with them. Fairer and more professional police departments will be far more able to cope with the rising incidence of street crime.

I. Protection of Negroes and civil rights workers from intimidation.

There should be broad support of Title V of the Administration's civil rights bill, which would provide greater Federal protection to Negroes and civil rights workers from intimidation.

Legislation should be enacted giving persons who suffer physical injury or property loss as the result of exercising rights protected by the criminal provisions of Title V, or as the result of urging or aiding others to exercise such rights, an opportunity to receive compensation for the injury or loss.

Any county, Government, city government, or other local government entity that employes officers who deprive persons of rights should be jointly liable with the officers to persons who suffer injury or loss from such officers' misconduct.

More Federal agents should be made available to increase the effective enforcement of civil rights laws.

II. Equal justice.

Title I and II of the Administration bill which provide for nondiscrimination in the selection of Federal and state jurors should be supported.

Federal legislation should be enacted to provide for the removal of civil rights cases from state to Federal trial courts in order to assure a fair trial.

Federal legislation should be enacted to permit private persons to obtain injunctive relief where state prosecutions are brought against persons for exercising First Amendment rights directed at obtaining equal treatment for all citizens.

Federal legislation should be enacted to afford more adequate criminal sanctions against state and local officials who deprive citizens of constitutional rights.

Law schools and bar associations, including the American Bar Association, should take steps to assure zealous representation by local counsel of Negroes and civil rights workers.

Legal aid centers should be established by the Federal Government to provide adequate legal representation to Negroes and civil rights workers.

III. Improvement of Police-community relations.

The Federal Government should seek to improve police-community relations by establishing assistance programs in the areas of recruitment, testing, selection, training, organization and pay.

The states and localities themselves must take action in those areas in which success will depend upon their initiative. The states should take the following steps:

1. Initiation of a positive and aggressive campaign to recruit and hire qualified minority group personnel.
2. Establishment of minimum state standards for all police officers.
3. Provision for periodic training programs.
4. Assist localities in developing better police forces.

The major burden for improving police-community relations rests on the local government. They should undertake the following steps:

1. Upgrade police organization, equipment and facilities.
2. Establish adequate complaint procedures.
3. Define the role that the police department is expected to play in the community.
4. Establish a community relations unit in the police department.

CORE Seeks New Agenda For Rights Talks Today

FED. POLICY 6/1/66

By JOHN HERBERS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 31—The White House Conference on Civil Rights, which opens here tomorrow, was dealt a blow today when the national director of the Congress of Racial Equality announced he would move to throw out the prepared agenda and start from scratch.

The announcement by Floyd B. McKissick added to the air of uncertainty that hung over the conference as the 2,500 delegates representing many views began arriving at the Sheraton-Park Hotel and setting up strategy caucuses of their own.

In this respect it seemed more like a political convention than a conference. If there was any prevailing attitude it was one of skepticism about what could be accomplished in two days by so many people of divergent opinions.

Mr. McKissick was a member of the 19-member council that drafted the broad set of recommendations that will be placed before the conference. These are aimed at helping the American Negro achieve the equality that has been promised to him under national law and policy.

He attended none of the preliminary meetings, however, saying today that the money he would have spent on travel and expenses was needed for CORE projects. Arriving as a delegate, he called a news conference and announced:

"We have decided after deliberation to participate—in order that the militant can bring forth ideas which otherwise would not be brought forth."

Then he said:

"There's a prevailing sentiment that the conference has been rigged by the Administration."

Mr. McKissick said CORE would offer a motion in the opening session tomorrow to permit a vote on any resolution offered. If this motion is denied, he said, CORE delegates will then decide "what action to take."

Don W. Heineman, the Chicago railroad executive who is chairman of the conference, indicated in an informal news conference in his hotel suite that he would not recognize such a motion.

It was the unanimous agreement of those attending the preliminary meetings, he said, to present the recommendations, let delegates discuss them and offer suggestions of their own but to take no votes on any matter.

Was Given Reports

"This is the first time I was aware that he [Mr. McKissick] was dissatisfied," Mr. Heineman said, noting that Mr. McKissick had accepted a position on the preliminary council and had been sent reports of the meetings.

Mr. Heineman said if votes ere taken the conference would turn into "great parliamentary confusion" and nothing would be accomplished.

Last week, the Studet nonviolent CCoordinating Committee announced that it was boycotting the convention because its members believed the Johnson Administration was not sincere about helping the Negro and because of American involvement in Vietnam.

Dick Gregory, the Negro comedian, turned down an invitation to attend the session and promised to join dissident groups i picketing it.

In New York yesterday, an affiliation of civil rights groups aligned with the militant poor called the conference "a frivilous exercise which will accomplish no hing."

Mr. McKissick was asked by

The New York Times

SCORES CONFERENCE: Floyd B. McKissick, national director of CORE, said White House conference on civil rights was "rigged."

reporters whether, if his recommendation were accepted, speakers would be "booed down" as Sargent Shriver, the anti-poverty director, was at a meeting in Washington a few weeks ago.

He replied he saw nothing wrong with a speaker being booed, that he himself was some times booed by followers who did no tagree with him.

Positive Tone Stressed

At the same time, other leaders were trying to establish a positive tone for the conference.

"This conference," said Dr. J. H. Jackson of Chicago, the Mississippi-born president of the National Baptist convention, "must address itself now to the problems of tensions and to threats of riots."

"We cannot ignore that we have new human tensions," he continued. "A great deal of bitterness has developed. We must be positive about the things that are being done."

The recommendations drafted by the preliminary council involve the Federal, state and local governments as well as the private sector.

The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., a member, estimated they would cost a minimum of $10-billion over the next 10 years if carried out. They include massive public works projects and doubling the effort for education.

Conspicuously absent from the recommendations is the theme suggested by President Johnson when he called the conference one year ago—the need to give stability to the Negro family, which as been damaged by centuries of slavery and injustice.

The author of an Administration report on the Negro family, former Assistant Secretary of Labor Daniel P. Moynihan, will attend as a delegate but is not expected to have anything to say in the public sessions.

Report Criticized

The report was widely criticized by civil rights leaders. This criticism was set off by Dr. Benjamin F. Payton, executive director of the Commission on Religion and Race of the National Council of Churches, in a published reply to Mr. Moynihan.

Dr. Payton is a leader in the New York group that condemned the conference yesterday. He also is a delegate to the conference.

Delegates expected to attend range from the very poor to Marlon Brando, the actor. Gov. Paul B. Johnson of Mississippi will attend, as well as the usual government and civil rights leaders who usually make up such meetings.

Except for the poor, who are being assisted by private foundations, delegates are paying their own way. To remind them of one reason why they are there, one hall of the hotel is devoted to large pictures of debris-littered slums and children staring down with hollow, hungry eyes.

Statement Not Approved

A statement by members of the executive committee of the New York Pre-White House Conference Committee, issued Monday criticising the White House Conference on Civil Rights was not approved by James Gallagher, executive director of the John LaFarge Institute.

Mr. Gallagher said that although he was a member of the executive committee of the organization, he did not authorize the use of his name in connection with the statement, as reported in The New York Times yesterday.

Leaders at Meeting Called by President Yield to Militants on Resolutions—Humphrey Says Equality Lags

6/2/66

By JOHN HERBERS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, June 1—The leaders of the White House Conference on Civil Rights yielded today to militant delegates and reluctantly agreed to permit a vote on resolutions that could embarrass the Administration.

As a result, resolutions criticizing the Johnson Administration's role in Vietnam and its enforcement of civil rights are likely to be approved in some sessions of the conference.

The development was a clear victory for Floyd McKissick, national director of the Congress of Racial Equality, and other delegates who opposed the White House plan to have no parliamentary procedures in the two-day conference.

"Our request has been granted," Mr. McKissick said triumphantly as delegates aligned with him began working on resolutions for presentation tomorrow.

Meanwhile, Vice President Humphrey, the keynote speaker at the conference, won delegates with a denunciation of the "gap between promise and performance" in civil rights.

Mr. Humphrey, showing the fire and flash that has captivated liberal audiences in the past, said that virtually all segments of American society had failed to meet the needs of the Negro.

The change in procedure at the conference was announced by Ben. W. Heineman, the Chicago railroad executive who is chairman of the two-day meeting. He indicated to the 2,400 delegates who had assembled in an immense meeting hall of the Sheraton-Park Hotel that he did so reluctantly.

Mr. Heineman said the 29-member council that drew up the agenda for the conference felt very strongly that a formal vote would only slow the work of the conference, but that each delegate should be allowed to speak on any subject.

"It has come to the council's

NEW YORK TIMES, THURSDAY, JUNE 2,

A Fiery Humphrey Denounces Society for Lag on Civil Rights

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, June 1—Vice President Hubert Humphrey denounced today virtually every segment of American society for maintaining a "gap between promise and performance" in civil rights. And the audience loved it.

It was the old Hubert Humphrey who addressed the White House Conference on Civil Rights. He seemed to be speaking not so much as an agent for President Johnson as an independent liberal speaking to other liberals who want to shake the country into action.

Mr. Humphrey was keynote speaker at the conference, which brought together many who have been bitterly critical of the Administration's enforcement of civil rights laws. The audience was at first cool, but when Mr. Humphrey finished he received a standing ovation.

The reaction obviously warmed the Vice President, who has been having problems with liberals. They have complained about his vigorous defense of the Vietnam war and about what they call his subservience to the White House.

Notes Federal Lag

Mr. Humphrey first acknowledged that the Federal Government had not done all it could to close "a tragic gap separating promise from performance." But then he said the blame could not be placed on any single person or institution, but with "every major segment of society."

Then he enumerated what he saw to be the shortcomings of each group, including Negroes who "appear more concerned about their own positions than about the plight of those less fortunate, less articulate members of their race."

Departing from his text, Mr. Humphrey said, "I'm not here in a popularity contest. I'm here in an act of conscience." This drew spirited applause from many of the 2,500 delegates.

"Twenty million Americans," he said, alluding to the American Negro, "will no longer be pacified by slogans and tokens."

"'Freedom Now' is not a catchword for a minority of Americans. Iit is a moral imperative for all Americans. We can strive toward it. . . . We can defer it, or distort it, or deceive whose who seek it. But we do so at our peril," he said.

He called for "hard, visible evidence that performance is linked with promise." He pledged on behalf of President Johnson that the Federal Government "will improve its performance wherever that is necessary."

But he said it would be in the state capitols and city halls, not in Congress or the Federal courtrooms, "where the major battles of the next phase of the civil rights struggle will be waged."

"It is in our states and local communities where we must wage the war against America's shame — slumism," he said.

Describes Slums

He went on to describe the slums in which many Negroes were forced to live, and he said that governments, labor and business and religious institutions had made progress in assimilating the Negro, but all had fallen short.

Referring to churches that fail to speak out affirmatively on "racial justice," Mr. Humphrey borrowed words often used by President Kennedy: "Dante said the hottest places in hell are reserved for those who maintain neutrality in periods of moral crisis."

He struck out at movements toward Black Nationalism when he said, "There are some Americans who see separation and exclusion as the remedy for racial injustice and evils of the past."

"Our entire American experience cries out against this approach," he said, "and our history books are filled with the failures of prior separatist movements."

He condemned those who would put down racial violence by the few "with heavy-handed, indiscriminate retaliation against the many" and he condemned those who see "in the struggle for freedom and equality a license for irresponsibility and violence."

"They are both wrong," he said, "and they must realize they are wrong—and realize it now—while there is still time to seek racial harmony and justice in America."

Mr. Humphrey said the nation would "require a depth of maturity and understanding seldom achieved on such controversial social and economic issues."

"The goal of 'freedom now,'" he said, "will be attained precisely to the degree we are successful in enlisting additional sources of strength in our march toward equality and justice."

Rights Conference Averts Showdown on War Policy

Parley Ends in Unity After CORE Fails to Win Support for Vietnam Pullout —Proposals to Aid Negro Backed

6/3/66

By JOHN HERBERS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, June 2—The White House Conference on Civil Rights ended in a show of unity tonight after the Administration and moderate Negro leaders had succeeded in heading off a move to call for American withdrawal from Vietnam.

A Vietnam resolution sponsored by the Congress of Racial Equality was soundly defeated or ruled out of order in the working sessions where it was brought up.

One of the sessions urged President Johnson to intensify his efforts to end the war. And there were resolutions calling for stronger enforcement of civil rights laws by the Administration.

Generally, however, the White House won its main objectives in the conference and apparently stopped, at least for the time being, a movement toward an anti-Administration foreign policy in the civil rights field.

The two-day conference had all the confusion and uncertainty of an open political convention and its usefulness could not be determined immediately.

But it was clear that the 29-member planning council would be able to submit a final report to President Johnson not too different from the broad set of proposals that the council had presented to the 2,600 delegates.

The proposals call for new spending and action on all levels of Government and the private sector in a combined effort to help the American Negro achieve equality of education, employment and mobility. The proposals will cost many billions of dollars. The Administration's concern over the Vietnam resolution offered by Floyd McKissi national director of CORE, became apparent this morning when Arthur J. Goldberg, United States Representative to the United Nations, showed up at several of the 12 workin sessions.

Mr. Goldberg expressed his deep interest in the cause of civil rights and did not mention the Vietnam issue. But later he told a news conference:

"I believe the cause of civil rights helps our foreign policy. I do not believe that what is happening in Vietnam applies to that fight."

Other high Administration officials attended the panels during the day.

Young's View Is Typical

Whitney M. Young, executive director of the National Urban League, expressed at a news conference what was perhaps the prevailing view of Negroes attending the conference.

"The people are more concerned about the rat tonight and the job tomorrow than they are about Vietnam," Mr. Young said. "If the alternative were guns or butter then we must cut Vietnam."

But he said he did not believe the nation faced that alternative; he believed that the nation could spend more to combat poverty without altering her commitments abroad. Therefore, Mr. Young said, he did not consider the Vietnam issue germane to the conference.

The issue came to a head in the session attended by Mr. McKissick in a glittering meeting room of the Sheraton-Park hotel. Mr. McKissick had won a fight with the Administration yesterday when leaders of the conference, which was headed by Ben W. Heineman, the Chicago railroad executive, reluctantly agreed to open the agenda to resolutions.

This morning, Mr. McKissick called a news conference in his room and said he believed "no longer that the conference is rigged, but that it is in reality a hoax."

A Ruling and a Vote

He enumerated a long list of complaints, including the expenditure of billions of dollars in Vietnam when great areas of poverty remain at home. One of the resolutions he had prepared called for the United States to "make equal opportunities for its minority citizens the No. 1 priority . . . and cease its involvement in Vietnam."

Mr. McKissick read the resolution at an afternoon session headed by James M. Nabrit Jr., Deputy Representative in the United Nations. Mr. Nabrit ruled the resolution out of order, saying:

"I don't want to put that albatross around the civil rights movement."

After a parliamentary fight Mr. Nabrit took a vote by a show of hands. About 100 voted against the resolution and nine for. Mr. McKissick charged that Mr. Nabrit had not acted propertly as chairman.

"This is what I'm here for, Mac," Mr. Nabrit replied.

A few minutes later Homer A. Jack, executive director of the Unitarian-Universalist Association, proposed and had adopted unanimously this resolution:

"This committee urges President Johnson to continue and intensify his efforts to bring the war in Vietnam to an early and honorable end so that the same and even a much greater level of Federal funds and Federal leadership can be focused to fulfill these civil rights today."

No Strong Support

In several other sessions the CORE resolution was ruled out of order or emasculated without a challenge from the floor. In other sessions the issue was not mentioned.

OFFERED RESOLUTION: Floyd B. McKissick, national director of the Congress of Racial Equality, offered the resolution at the White House Conference on Civil Rights calling for United States withdrawal from South Vietnam.

The sessions were headed by men and women appointed by the conference planners. But it was apparent that there was no substantial sentiment for adoption of such a strong proposal.

Silent throughout the conference was the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., who has been critical of the Administration's stand in Southeast Asia. Dr. King, who heads the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, was reported at the conference today, but he could not be found by reporters.

Walter Reuther, the head of the United Automobile Workers, announced the consensus of many civil rights leaders when he spoke at a news conference in behalf of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, an affiliation of liberal organizations.

"If people want to debate foreign policy," he said, "they should have a White House Conference on Foreign Policy."

Many of the sessions, however, did accept without opposition CORE resolutions charging the Administration with laxity in civil rights enforcement and calling for greater effort to achieve desegregation under the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

From Home Rule to F.B.I.

In a typical session, the delegates adopted resolutions calling for the following:

¶Home rule for the District of Columbia.

¶Quick passage of the civil rights legislation pending before Congress.

¶More Federal involvement in efforts to set up civilian review boards on police brutality.

¶On-the-spot arrests and greater involvement in civil rights cases by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

¶A system of priorities on the broad recommendations drafted by the planning council.

Although there was no formal endorsement of the planning council recommendations the prevailing opinion was that they should be made more specific and adopted. The recommendations fill more than 100 pages and include new public works programs, guaranteed employment, and new efforts in education, housing and administration of justice.

Broad and Costly Proposals Emerge From Meeting Influenced by Johnson

6/4/66

By JOHN HERBERS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, June 3—The White House Conference on Civil Rights, which ended last night in an unusual show of harmony and good humor, is expected to give President Johnson some new leverage in getting Great Society legislation enacted. The multibillion dollar package of proposals that won the general approval of the 2,600 delegates make current Government proposals seem pale and noncontroversial by comparison.

News Analysis

Ben W. Heineman, the chairman of the Chicago & North Western Railway who served as chairman of the two-day conference, said the meeting had amounted to an "overwhelming consensus in favor of the planning council's recommendations for an action program to help American Negroes achieve in reality the rights that have been opened to them in theory."

Mr. Heineman said a final report would be submitted to President Johnson in about a month and that he hoped Congress would enact the major recommendations for Federal legislation. These include huge public works projects, larger antipoverty appropriations, guaranteed jobs or income and large new outlays for education.

In the opinion of some delegates, this amounts to "just indemnity" for centuries of injustice to Negro Americans.

But others say that the recommendations are so broad and so general that they amount to no mandate at all for President Johnson or Congress.

Almost everyone agrees, however that the conference was President Johnson's show all the way. The Federal apparatus in the skillful hands of Lyndon Johnson seemed capable of controlling even so uncertain a force as the civil rights movement.

There is doubt about the conference mobilizing public opinion behind the proposals because it did not represent a cross-section of society as planners had said it would. The conservatives who had been invited—Southern Governors, for instance—did not show up in numbers while civil rights leaders and Government officials were there in full force.

The conference, in fact, had a strange evolution. President Johnson called it one year ago in a remarkable speech at Howard University.

In the speech, Mr. Johnson suggested that all Americans must make a special effort to help Negroes achieve equality of results as well as of opportunity, and this would require a change in men's hearts as well as laws and national policy.

A planning session held in the fall generated some ideas but got out of control when the delegates, mostly civil rights activists, insisted on criticizing the Administration's enforcement of existing civil rights laws.

For the full conference, Mr. Johnson appointed Mr. Heineman as chairman and a 29-member planning council that consisted of civil rights, labor, business and religious leaders. Delegates were carefully screened to keep out potential trouble-makers.

But the chief maker of trouble for the Administration turned out to be a member of the council, Floyd McKissick, the new national director of the Congress of Racial Equality.

Mr. McKissick had attended none of the planning sessions, apparently because of anti-Administration sentiment within his organization. He arrived at the conference declaring that it was rigged and said he could participate only if the rules were change to permit a vote on resolutions.

The council had a choice of changing the rules or having the conference thrown into a bitter fight. It changed the rules, though Mr. McKissick had one resolution calling for American withdrawal from Vietnam.

At this point, the Federal apparatus went into operation. President Johnson made an unscheduled appearance at the dinner Tuesday night and won a warm reception by reiterating dedication to the movement and by taking the unusual action of introducing a speaker, Solicitor General Thurgood Marshall, a pioneer Negro leader.

The next morning Arthur J. Goldberg, United States delegate to the United Nations, and other Cabinet members came to the conference. The working sessions were laced with Federal officials. The session at which Mr. McKissick presented his Vietnam resolution, which was soundly defeated, was chaired by a Goldberg assistant, James M. Nabrit Jr.

Many Negro leaders who agreed with Mr. McKissick on Vietnam remained silent, believing with Mr. Nabrit that the issue was "an albatross" for the conference.

"It looks to me," one Negro leader said, "that we are going to have to have Mr. Johnson as our leader whether we want him or not."

The conference, after all, had come out almost as the civil rights establishment had wanted it to.

The White House had originally planned that the conference by centered on strengthening the Negro family, which has been damaged by centuries of slavery and discrimination. But civil rights leaders had bitterly opposed this and the subject was not even on the agenda of the conference.

The man who originally proposed this central theme, Daniel P. Moynihan, former Assistant Secretary of Labor, was a silent, unnoticed delegate, but he was said to believe that the country had missed an opportunity to give the conference a theme that might have resulted in the righting of old wrongs.

HELPING NEGROES INTO MAINSTREAM OF LIFE

'Here's Another Chance'

By JOHN ASKINS

The June White House conference on civil rights represented a final opportunity for state and local governments and organizations to take the initiative in helping Negroes into the mainstream of American life, believes Dr. Vivian Henderson.

Dr. Henderson, president of Clark College, was chairman of a task force that shaped the economic proposals discussed at the conference.

The conference, entitled "To Fulfill These Rights," was represented in the headlines mainly by accounts of internal dissention. But it had a significance that went deeper than flashes of controversy, and served to say two things to the American public, says Dr. Henderson:

"Number one, it was called by the President of the United States, which means it was something sponsored by 190 million people. It said in this framework that the national conscience is being further examined on this question.

"It said that we need to say again to the nation and the world that we are not satisfied with our progress, that we're not going to be satisfied until we complete this job, and that we don't have from now until eternity to complete it.

"AND WHEN we talk of completing, we talk not only of preventing further inequities but of correcting the inequities that are part of the past.

"It also says, this White House thing, it says in essence that we are now trying to arrive at some means whereby we can say to business firms and to private employers, to the states and cities, 'now we're trying to come up with some programs that would at least give you a sense of direction on what YOU could do, and what you ought to do.'

"And I think this is also saying, 'If you don't do it now, if you don't respond now, then this is the last chance. The federal government is just going to have to take a bigger hold.' I think personally that this is unfortunate in many ways.

"I'm not trying to interpret the mood of the President and others who are responsible for planning. But it does seem to me that something's being said: 'Now, here's another chance.'

DR. VIVIAN HENDERSON
Chairman of Task Force

"The whole thing was cast in the framework of trying to see if we couldn't find out what people in local areas would do. This was part of the mood of the conference. And I think we will get some action on local levels."

TO THAT END, participants said, the conference debated myriad proposals, these among them:

— Creation of metropolitan job councils in all major urban areas, made up of business, labor, government and educational leaders, to coordinate all local efforts to find jobs for Negroes, establish centers in ghetto districts to work with hard-core unemployed, and assume leadership in local branches of a national year-round youth job placement program, among other things.

— Development of an emergency Rural Jobs Task Force to report no later than Sept. 1 with recommendations for improving the economic lot of rural Negroes.

— Creation of government-financed public works and services programs to provide jobs for workers who can't find them anywhere else. Included would be a "guaranteed employment" plan.

— Origination of plans to reduce racial concentration in schools of pupils, teachers and administrative personnel.

— Strengthening of federal sanctions against school segregation.

DR. HENDERSON SAYS the overriding mood of the conference was "urgency."

"We had people from Watts, from Gary, Ind., from the South side of Chicago, from Harlem, even from Vine City here in Atlanta. We had people there who time and time again just said —almost like throwing up their hands — you know, 'What do you expect me to do? I know the money's there, I know damn well I don't have to be in this situation; now doggone it, I can't just sit here and allow my children to grow up like this. Now, what are we going to do?' There was a tremendous sense of urgency about this."

He points out that the old technique of direct action protests probably won't work to solve such problems as unemployment, second-rate schools, rural poverty and the like.

"Until we get at the basic disadvantages, the emancipation of Negroes into the mainstream is going to be mighty minimal—and you cannot solve these with direct action protest . . . It may play a minor role, but direct action cannot solve the problems of technological change."

THE REPORT of the recommendations of the conference are expected to be made public around June 23. Not all the proposals listed above, nor the many others discussed, received majority approval. But all the ideas, discussed will be drifting around in Washington for some time to come, and the more workable ones may well find their way into further debate.

Another important figure at the conference, Vernon Jordan of the Southern Regional Council, said "There will be legislation coming out of this, but it won't be legislation dealing with civil rights per se. It will address itself to basic social problems."

Dr. Henderson agrees. "I don't think you'd ever get the Congress to pass legislation of this sort specifically for any racial group. Much of the impetus for the War on Poverty was the civil rights revolution, but the President couldn't have said, 'This is a War on Poverty for Negroes,' "

A $35-Billion Plan To Help the Negro Is Urged by Javits

FED. POLICY

Senator Jacob K. Javits proposed yesterday that the Federal Government spend $35-billion in the next decade as part of a "Marshall Plan" for Negroes and other minority groups.

The New York Republican said this figure was 10 per cent of the total that he said should be spent to start a domestic program for Americans "who have been the traditional target of discrimination."

The 90 per cent additional, he said, should come from state and local governments, supplemented by private sources such as business and foundations. Although he did not publicly mention the total, he said afterward that this over-all figure would be $350-billion in 10 years.

Mr. Javits included in his proposal a national minimum welfare allowance, doubled expenditures on education, more training programs for unemployed Negroes, more higher education and more and better public housing.

He said that 77 per cent of the current Federal budget was being spent for defense and foreign aid.

"Far reaching domestic programs to improve our way of life should receive support of the same magnitude lest we stand charged with helping all the world while neglecting our own brothers," he declared.

TheSenator addressed a luncheon gathering of 600 persons at the Commodore Hotel under the auspices of the Catholic Interracial Council of New York. He received the organization's John La Farge Award for Interracial Justice from Cardinal Spellman, Archbishop of New York.

Among others paying tribute to Mr. Javits were Jackie Robinson, board charman of the Freedom National Bank; David Sarnoff, board chairman of the Radio Corporation of America, and Gerald L. Carroll, chairman of the council.

By REMER TYSON
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — The federal government has started applying to the South a provision that has been referred to as the "atom bomb" of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, as the Griffin, Ga., school system has discovered already.

The provision is the 1964 law's Title VI, which permits 20 federal agencies to withhold funds from state or local organizations accused of racial discrimination.

A new interagency report, which one recipient said still has some "bugs" in it, is circulated weekly to the federal agencies listing school systems and hospitals either reported not in compliance or suspected of not being in compliance with Title VI.

The Griffin-Spalding County school system up until last week had not been certified by the U.S. Office of Education for compliance with the 1966 desegregation guidelines.

As a result the Department of the Army cut off funds for the school system's Junior Reserve Officers Training Corps (ROTC).

School Supt. G. W. Patrick said Third Army headquarters previously had approved the Griffin ROTC program, and that the Department of the Army action cost two employes half of a month's pay.

The Army restored the ROTC funds when the school system was judged last week by the Office of Education to be in compliance with the desegregation guidelines.

Patrick said the Army was asked by the Office of Education most daily, it was pointed out.

Civil rights organizations in the past have sharply criticized the federal government for not using Title VI more effectively in the South.

The Department of Justice, which calls the shots on administration of the compliance law, has leaned toward efforts to desegregate Southern schools and hospitals through negotiations whenever possible.

The compliance policy apparently has been stiffened to bring additional resources of the federal government to bear against schools and hospitals reluctant to comply with the latest guidelines.

As U.S. Applies Pressure

WASHINGTON — The federal government has started applying to the South a provision that has been referred to as the "atom bomb" of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, as the Griffin, Ga., school system has discovered already.

The provision is the 1964 law's Title VI, which permits 20 federal agencies to withhold funds from state or local organizations accused of racial discrimination.

A new interagency report, which one recipient said still has some "bugs" in it, is circulated weekly to the federal agencies listing school systems and hospitals either reported not in compliance or suspected of not being in compliance with Title VI.

The Griffin-Spalding County school system up until last week had not been certified by the U.S. Office of Education for compliance with the 1966 desegregation guidelines.

As a result the Department of the Army cut off funds for the school system's Junior Reserve Officers Training Corps (ROTC).

School Supt. G. W. Patrick said Third Army headquarters previously had approved the Griffin ROTC program, and that the Department of the Army action cost two employes half of a month's pay.

The Army restored the ROTC funds when the school system was judged last week by the Office of Education to be in compliance with the desegregation guidelines.

Patrick said the Army was asked by the Office of Education to cut off the ROTC funds to bring additional pressure on the school system to comply with the regulations.

However, the Army didn't necessarily have to be asked to withhold the federal money.

The Department of Defense is one of the agencies which receive part of approximately 2,000 reports telling the weekly status of Title VI compliance activities.

The status reports are issued through the Statistics and Reports Branch, Office of Equal Health Opportunity, U.S. Public Health Service.

The Office of Education's Equal Opportunity Office supplies information about school compliances.

40 SYSTEMS

For instance, this week's report listed 40 school systems and 23 hospitals in Georgia which have not been approved for compliance.

Federal education and Medicare funds already are being deferred for these schools and hospitals.

The other federal agencies supplying U.S. dollars to these schools and hospitals could check the interagency report to determine if the Georgia institutions are in compliance.

COULD WITHHOLD

If they have not complied, funds from the other agencies could be withheld from the local organizations.

One agency source said he doubted that the weekly report would be used as the sole basis of withholding all agency funds, but it would serve as a government-wide warning flag that these schools and hospitals are not certified for compliance.

It is anticipated that the agencies will investigate in detail the compliance status of a local organization before cutting off funds because the school and hospital lists change almost daily, it was pointed out.

Civil rights organizations in the past have sharply criticized the federal government for not using Title VI more effectively in the South.

The Department of Justice, which calls the shots on administration of the compliance law, has leaned toward efforts to desegregate Southern schools and hospitals through negotiations whenever possible.

The compliance policy apparently has been stiffened to bring additional resources of the federal government to bear against schools and hospitals reluctant to comply with the latest guidelines.

Committee to Weigh Report of White House Meeting

NYT 8/26/66

By JOHN HERBERS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Aug. 25 — President Johnson appointed an inter-departmental committee today to study the recommendations of the White House Conference on Civil Rights of June 1 and 2.

The committee is to make an interim report to the President within 30 days for possible legislative or departmental action.

The White House made it clear, however, that Mr. Johnson could not endorse all of the recommendations. And the action was interpreted by some as a downgrading of the proposals made by the conference.

About 2,500 delegates met in panels of 200 for two days, and discussed recommendations drawn up earlier by a 29-member planning council headed by Ben. W. Heineman, chairman of the Chicago & North Western Railway.

These recommendations, most of which were approved or expanded on by the delegates, included a broad range of suggested action by Federal state and local governments and by private groups, for helping Negro Americans achieve rights promised them under Federal law and policy.

Projects Are Suggested

The suggestions include vast public works projects, an increased educational effort at every level and guaranteed employment and income.

No one has attempted to estimate the cost to the Federal Government of carrying out the suggestions, but it would run into many billions of dollars.

In its report to the President, the council repeated the recommendations and summarized the discussions of the delegates.

In announcing receipt of the report at a Cabinet meeting today, Mr. Johnson said:

"It is important that the recommendations of the council and the conference receive serious attention by local, state and Federal Government officials. And much more than official action is involved here."

He noted that many of the recommendations were directed at private groups—organized labor, business, foundations and religious and civic organizations.

A White House spokesman said Mr. Johnson disagreed with some of the recommendations but believed that most of them should be put into effect. The spokesman said the President did not specify which ones he could not accept.

In addition to reporting to the President, the new committee is to "reply to the report's criticisms of present programs, describe the efforts the departments will make to keep the report under consideration in the future and examine the full 5,000-page transcript of the conference for recommendations or suggestions made by the conferees."

Copies of the report released today will be sent to mayors in more than 500 cities.

There was no indication in today's action that any of the recommendations would ultimately result in legislative action, as many participants of the conference had wished.

Joseph L. Rauh Jr., counsel for the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, an affiliation of organizations, said "The results have been disappointing as far as civil rights legislation is concerned."

He noted that all of the panels at the conference had urged enactment of a much stronger civil rights bill this year than the Administration had submitted and that the House of Representatives had watered down the section on open housing. The bill is now in the Senate.

The conference was proposed by President Johnson on June 5, 1965, to be held in the fall. Instead, a preliminary planning conference was held in November and this turned primarily into a forum for criticizing the Administration's enforcement of civil rights laws.

Mr. Johnson then appointed the council headed by Mr. Heineman and composed of a cross-section of civil rights, business, labor and civic leaders to draw an agenda for the conference.

Report to President

The report was formally submitted to the President today by Mr. Heineman and A. Philip Randolph, the Negro labor leader and honorary chairman of the conference.

Harry C. McPherson Jr., special counsel to the President, and Clifford Alexander, deputy special counsel, were named co-chairmen of the interdepartmental committee today.

Other members are: Lisle C. Carter Jr., Assistant Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare; H. Ralph Taylor, Assistant secretary of Housing and Urban Development; Stanley Ruttenberg, Assistant Secretary of Labor; William D. Carey, Assistant Director of the Bureau of the Buget; John Doar, Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights; Roger W. Wilkins, Director of the Community Relations Service; Bertrand M. Harding, Deputy Director of the Office of Economic Opportunity, and Leroy Collins, Under Secretary of Commerce.

JOHNSON CONCEDES ERRORS ON RIGHTS

NYT 10/7/66

But Says U.S. Must Pursue Positive Enforcement Role

FED. POLICY

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Oct. 6 — President Johnson agreed with Southern critics today that there had been "some harassment and some mistakes" in enforcing civil rights laws.

But the President reiterated his commitment to racial equality and pledged to see that "all citizens of this country are treated equally without discrimination." And he said the Federal Government must pursue a positive role in this regard.

Many of the questions put to Mr. Johnson in his news conference concerned the racial question, which has assumed new political significance as white resistance to civil rights enforcement has spread to new areas outside the South.

Harassment Charged

Southern members of Congress, and some from the North, have charged that the Department of Health, Education and Welfare has harassed Southern officials in enforcing the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and has gone beyond the law in attempting to achieve racial balance in schools and other institutions.

Mr. Johnson was asked where he stood on the dispute "between those who feel the Federal Government should merely strike down legal barriers to equality and those who feel the Government should play a more positive role in encouraging integration."

"I think the Federal Government should be a leader in this field," Mr. Johnson said. He added he had tried to fully enforce the civil rights laws on the books.

"I realize," he said, "that in some instances there has been some harassment and some mistakes have been made. Some people have been enthusiastic and differences have developed.

"But where those mistakes have been made," he continued, "I think Mr. [John W.] Gardner [Health, Education and Welfare Secretary] and the Commissioner of Education [Harold Howe 3d] have been willing to always listen to any protest . . . and to carry out the law as Congress intended it."

He said that would continue to be the policy of his administration.

G.O.P. Poll Cited

Mr. Johnson was reminded that the Republican Coordinating Committee had found from a poll that public concern over crime and riots had surpassed concern over inflation and related economic matters, and that the Republicans were blaming the Administration for riots in many cities in recent weeks.

The President pointed out he had spoken out against violence and that the nation had "very serious problems" in urban areas.

"I hope that we can keep violence out of the picture," Mr. Johnson said. "I have done every thing that I know how in cooperation with the Mayors, the chief executives of the cities, and the chief executives of the states concerned."

He said the Administration was "very concerned" and "very determined to do everything within our prerogative to see that reason prevails over violence."

"We think that the protestors themselves have the most to lose by disapproval of some of the actions that have taken place. And while we are not oblivious to the problems that bring forth the protests, we are concerned that they be protests without violence and within law and within order."

U.S. Social Science Agency Proposed

By RICHARD EDER

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Oct 9 — Legislation to set up an independent Federal institution to finance social science research will be introduced tomorrow in the Senate.

The bill, which was drawn up by Senator Fred Harris of Oklahoma and the staff of his Subcommittee on Government Research after informal consultation with the Administration, has strong support in the Senate.

Among its 20 co-sponsors are the majority leader, Mike Mansfield of Montana; the assistant minority leader, Thomas H. Kuchel of California; Senator John O. Pastore of Rhode Island, and other influential Senators.

One main purpose of the bill, which would establish a National Foundation for the Social Sciences modeled on the National Science Foundation, is to devise a means for using Federal money to support research in politically and socially important fields without arousing a suspicion of academic impropriety.

Over the last two years, disclosures that social science research work was being financed by the Central Intelligence Agency and the Defense Department have created a controversy that has jarred the academic community and, in one instance, has prompted Presidential intervention.

The most celebrated case involved Operation Camelot, a study of the causes of insurgency in Latin America and other developing areas that was conducted by an office connected with American University.

When the project came to light in Chile, and it was disclosed that the United States Army was paying for it, there was an explosion in Chilean political circles that resulted in acute embarrassment at the State Department. President Johnson ordered the Army to cancel the project.

Mr. Johnson also ordered the State Department to screen all Federally financed research projects abroad for propriety and potential political difficulties.

Another Army-backed study in Colombia, called Operation Simpatico, was disclosed. This was followed by reports of C.I.A. involvement in a South Vietnamese technical assistance project conducted by Michigan State University.

For the last year, the question has been discussed at a series of meetings of scholarly societies, in academic journals, at specially organized seminars, and in a series of hearings before Senator Harris's subcommittee.

The burden of the complaints voiced by leading social scientists was that research into subjects such as social change, when funded by "operational" agencies such as the Army and the C.I.A., was inevitably suspect as to its motives.

By accepting such support, especially if an attempt was made to conceal it, scholars were said to discredit themselves and to block the access of other scholars to their sources, especially abroad.

Shortage of Funds Cited

Other scholars and academic administrators cited an acute shortage of funds for social—as opposed to physical—science research. To ask the academic world to reject an important source of funds was perhaps to ask too much, they said.

The bill to create the social science foundation is designed to help solve this dilemma.

The foundation would be independent of all other Federal agencies, and it would be forbidden to allow interference with its personnel or policies from any other Federal official or department.

A 25-member board of trustees made up of leading figures in various areas of the social sciences would supervise its work. It would have a director and deputy director named by the President and approved by the Senate.

With an annual buget of $15-million to $20-million, it would finance research in political science, economics, psychology, sociology, anthropology, law, history, statistics, geography, demography, linguistics and international relations.

The foundation would be allowed to accept contracts for research from other Government agencies, including the Defense Department the C.I.A., but the connection would be announced and all research would be made available to the public.

The foundation would retain complete control of personnel selection and research strategy. Furthermore, it would not be allowed to accept contracts worth more than a quarter of its own reesarch budget from any agency.

All projects would be screened by the foundation's staff and consultants for scientific interest and possible political repercussions, especially abroad.

Asia-Bound President Appeals to Bias Victims

AC 10/17/66

By WALTER R. MEARS

DOYLESTOWN, Pa. (AP) — On the eve of his departure on a peacemaking mission to Asia, President Lyndon B. Johnson appealed Sunday to people who have suffered discrimination to join in helping to wipe it out now.

The President came to this small Pennsylvania city after attending church in Washington, signing a batch of bills and receiving a report from his Treasury secretary that he leaves the nation's economy in robust shape as he departs Monday on a history-making, 17-day visit to six Far Eastern nations.

Johnson came to join in the dedication of a Roman Catholic shrine dedicated to peace and linked with the history of Poland, now a Communist-bloc nation.

Johnson lauded the spirit of Polish-Americans and told his audience: "We have not forgotten your friends and relatives in Poland. We have not forgotten the traditional bonds that have united our peoples since our earliest days as a nation.

"We intend to strengthen those bonds."

The occasion was the dedication of the national Shrine of Our Lady of Czestochowa, a shrine Johnson described as "a symbol of one thousand years of Polish civilization and Polish Christianity."

He said that to him, the shrine also symbolizes millions of men and women who came to America's shores as immigrants searching for a better way of life.

As he said to Italian-Americans in New York City last week, Johnson noted these people "were no strangers to discrimination." The President said that Thaddeus Kosciusko, typified the spirit of Polish-Americans when he fought in the Revolutionary War, and later put himself "at the forefront of the movement to abolish slavery and discrimination."

Weaver Warns Against Creating A Monolith to Oversee Aid Plans

Tells Senate Unit He Opposes a Council to Direct the 170 Federal Projects in U.S.

By JOHN D. MORRIS
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Nov. 16—Robert C. Weaver, Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, cautioned a Senate subcommittee today against "a monolithic approach" to the problem of coordinating Federal aid to states and localities.

He suggested that such an approach was inherent in a proposal by Senator Edmund S. Muskie, Democrat of Maine, for creation of a coordinating council of Cabinet officers under the chairmanship of the President.

Mr. Weaver testified at the opening of hearings conducted by Senator Muskie on how to improve the management of what the Senator called "an incredible array" of 170 aid programs involving nearly $15-billion in annual Federal outlays.

Mr. Muskie presided as chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Intergovernmental Relations, a unit of the Senate Government Operations Committee. He was the only member present for the first of four scheduled hearings.

The Senator said Federal aid to states and localities was expected to soar to $60-billion by 1975 compared with less than $1-billion in 1956.

State and Local Outlay Rises

Meanwhile, he reported, state and local expenditures have risen to $95-billion—a 517 per cent increase since 1966—and "may hit the $150-billion mark" by 1975.

"We are looking for recommendations for improving planning and program coordination at Federal, state and local levels," he said, "and we are looking for a mechanism for improving intergovernmental relations."

Secretary Weaver testified that progress toward coordinating his department's 60 programs with the frequently overlapping responsibilities of other Federal departments and agencies was being made under a Presidential Executive order issued last August.

Authority to Coordinate

The order gave him authority to convene meetings with representatives of the other Federal jurisdictions to iron out conflicts and develop coordinated approaches.

In an exchange with Senator Muskie, he asked for a fair trial of the new procedure rather than the early establishment of any Presidential-level council such as the Senator has proposed.

The New York Times
Robert C. Weaver

He said a monolithic approach "lacks the flexibility you have to have" in dealing with other Federal agencies and with state and local governments.

At the local level, he added, "there is also the problem of the Federal colossus coming in." He did not elaborate on that point.

Senator Muskie said he was "not wedded" to his own proposal but still saw a need for an effective coordinating mechanism at the Federal level.

"There is an almost total lack of coordination in the Federal grant-in-aid program," he maintained.

President Points to Actions For Calming Racial Unrest

FEDERAL POLICY

Special to The New York Times

JOHNSON CITY, Tex., July 5—President Johnson, confronted with what appears to be rising racial tension in many of the nation's cities, stressed today the steps being taken to alleviate the sources of the tension.

Although the President did not explicitly urge patience, he clearly indicated that he was sympathetic to Negro aspirations and wished that extremists on both sides of the racial issue would quiet down.

The President strongly indicated that he did not think that the new battle cry of militant Negroes—"black power"—would lead to constructive results. This phrase has been recurring with increased frequency in the pronouncements of leaders of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee and the Congress of Racial Equality.

Stresses 'Democratic Power'

"We are not interested in black power and we are not interested in white power," the President declared. "But we are interested in American democratic power, with a small d."

The President said that his Administration was trying in every way it could to find jobs for the unemployed and to make people in the cities stop practicing discrimination.

"We are trying to meet the poverty situation as we find it with the limited resources at our command," he said.

Americans, regardless of race, he said, should have the right to vote, to a job at decent wages and a decent home.

The Administration, he said,

PRESIDENT POINTS TO RACIAL MOVES

is doing everything it can "to improve these terrible conditions that exist in the ghettos of this country."

"We can't do it all overnight," he told a news conference at his ranch near here. "We are much too late. But we have done more in the last 24 months than has been done in any similar 24-month period to face up to these conditions of health, education, poverty and discrimination."

"We are going to continue as long as I am President to do everything we can to see that all citizens are treated equally and have equal opportunities," Mr. Johnson went on.

"When we achieve that, I think we will find a good deal of the solution to the problem" of racial incidents, he said.

Administration officials were deeply relieved when the recent Negro marches in Mississippi went carried through with as little violence as there was.

One reason they were apprehensive was that they feared violence against the marchers would produce reprisals against whites in the racially tense slums of many of America's cities.

They hope that racial explosions can be avoided during the period it will take for new programs designed to ease the plight of poor and uneducated Negroes in the slums to become effective.

Kennedy Says War Is Used as Excuse

FED. POLICY

WASHINGTON, Aug. 15 (UPI) — Sen. Robert F. Kennedy, D-N.Y., accused the Johnson administration Monday of using the war in Viet Nam as an excuse for cutting back spending programs to combat the plight of the nation's cities.

Sen. Kennedy

Kennedy made the charge as a Senate subcommittee opened a two-year investigation of the use of federal funds by American cities and their problems, including underlying causes of racial violence.

Kennedy proposed that current federal programs be designed to employ slum dwellers in rebuilding cities. But he said additional money was needed.

"The demands of Viet Nam, purportedly responsible for cutbacks in vital education, housing and poverty programs, in fact still represent less than 3 per cent of our national product. All military expenditures, even with the expected supplemental appropriations bill after the elections, still take less than 10 per cent of our gross national product," the senator said.

"With the growth in revenues and even with the expenditures in Viet Nam, the federal government today is spending a smaller proportion of our gross national product than it did three years ago."

HE DECLARED that the government should add $6 billion to annual spending for the cities immediately.

"We'll spend $600 million for the economic development of 15 million people in South Viet Nam this year," Kennedy remarked.

KENNEDY CHARGES

"But federal poverty and educational employment assistance to the same number of people in New York will be less than one-sixth that amount.

Another complaint at the opening session was that big business has blackmailed local governments into inaction.

Sen. Joseph S. Clark, D-Pa., made the accusation as the Senate subcommittee on executive reorganization began its intensive look at the benefits cities may have reaped from the $96 billion in federal aid they have gotten over the past decade.

Clark, a onetime mayor of Philadelphia, said U.S. cities have been unable to finance programs to combat slums, sickness, ignorance, pollution, choking traffic and the turmoil that breeds racial violence.

He said that while the federal government has adopted the graduated income tax, cities have attempted to struggle along with regressive excise and property taxes.

"The sad fact is that competition among the states to get industry is so keen that states are reluctant to shift the burden to progressive taxes," Clark said.

FEDERAL PROGRAMS

'To Produce a Creative Disorder'

The Grand Design Of the Poverty Program

By NATHAN GLAZER

THE antipoverty program is now a year and a half old. It is running at the rate of about $1.5-billion a year, with about two-fifths going to support the Community Action Programs—the most original and controversial part of the whole antipoverty campaign—and another two-fifths going for the Job Corps, the Neighborhood Youth Corps and the College Work-Study programs. Of the remaining programs, the largest is the work-experience program (primarily for welfare clients)—10 per cent of the total—and the best known is the domestic peace corps or VISTA (Volunteers in Service to America) program, which is budgeted at only 1½ per cent of the total. The entire $1.5-billion for the antipoverty program is about 1½ per cent of the Federal budget, or a quarter of 1 per cent of the Gross National Product.

It is worth keeping these dimensions in mind when we talk about the antipoverty program. Whether the poverty-stricken are 15 per cent or 25 per cent of the American people may be argued. Certainly there are a good number of them. And whatever the causes of poverty—or the definition of poverty—it seems reasonable that a good deal more than the present sums might well be invested in overcoming it. The question the antipoverty program raises most sharply, however, is not the general one—"Shall we do something about poverty?"—but the very specific one: "What shall we do about poverty?" And what we are doing, it seems to me, is by no means the best way of attacking the problem.

THREE key decisions underlie the antipoverty program:

First, the framers of the antipoverty program decided that this was not to be a job-creation program, as were the great welfare programs of the New Deal—W.P.A., C.C.C., P.W.A., N.Y.A. Its major efforts are directed toward youth. The aim of these efforts is not so much the employment of young people as an end in itself, but rather their training for employment, by teaching them the required demeanor for holding any job, as in the Neighborhood Youth Corps, and the specific skills for holding certain jobs, as in the Job Corps. There is little emphasis on conservation of natural resources for its own sake, or on providing additional income to impoverished families through the work of youth, as in the C.C.C. Indeed, one hears remarkably little about conservation work in the publicity of the Job Corps, for it was early decided that saving trees and soil would not teach boys and girls the skills necessary to become productive in an urban society. The income earned is kept by the Job Corps recruit himself—though he can if he wishes have some of it sent back to his family.

The decision to emphasize youth was almost dictated by the nature of the poverty problem. Our poor consist in large measure of old people retired from the labor force on one hand, and young people not yet in it, living in families without adult male providers, on the other. Almost as high a proportion of children as of old people lives in poverty. The best recent study shows that 25 per cent of those under 18, and 30 per cent of those over 65, live in poverty. Among the 35 million poor are 15 million under 18, and 5 million over 65.

The emphasis on youth cannot be argued with. The emphasis on training, however, has been questioned. Does the young man out of school need training, or does he need a job? Is not the training on a real job more effective than the counseling and training attached to a job which is created especially for him, and in which he is under the authority of social workers much of the time?

Most job education in this country occurs on the job. A good deal occurs in public and private vocational schools. Is the special approach of the Job Corps and the Neighborhood Youth Corps necessary to supplement these major forms of job education? Some who argued at the beginning that all that the unemployed, out-of-school youth needed was a job have been con- (Continued on Page 64)

vinced by experience that he probably needs a good deal of work counseling, job training, and orientation in what we may call job demeanor as well. But one can still argue that all this might have been better provided by a full-employment economy in which employers would find it worthwhile to train less-skilled and less-motivated workers.

But, of course, the framers of the antipoverty program were not asked to propose policy for the American economy. Asked to handle the problem of poverty, they could, one assumes, have said: "This is a job for high economic policy makers. If we can reduce the unemployment rate to 2 per cent, private industry will undertake the task of job training for youth as it seeks new employes." But we are dealing with problems that are in any case not to be solved by an exclusive reliance on one approach as against another. There is enough evidence that the inability of youth to get jobs, at least in the economy we have, is based to some extent on weak job skills. If we can get some improvement in that, it is certainly worth investing $600-million a year. In addition, we should not forget the fact that this is not only a job-training program, but that the young people are also working. We get some benefit from their work in agencies of city government and in nonprofit institutions, and, in effect, through these programs we subsidize some parts of our affluent society which we know are starved, such as maintenance work in city parks.

THE second major decision of the antipoverty program was to set up a new agency, the Office of Economic Opportunity, to direct some of the new programs—in particular, the Community Action Program—and to coordinate other programs that fell under such agencies as the Department of Labor and the Department of Health, Education and Welfare. One can well ask whether this agency was necessary. One could have envisaged a program which expanded existing agencies—the youth counseling and training services of the Department of Labor, the vocational education programs financed by the Office of Education, the programs to overcome dependency that are being undertaken by various welfare departments with the support of the Federal Welfare Administration.

One could even have proposed an antipoverty program that increased grants—through Social Security and old-age assistance and Medicare—to the aged, thus automatically raising five million out of the poverty group, and increased payments to mothers with dependent children, thus doing the same for the majority of those in poverty. Indeed, in the sharp debate between Irving Kristol on the one hand and on the other Michael Harrington and Paul Jacobs (the latter two participated as consultants in the framing of the antipoverty program) in the pages of The New Leader early in 1964, this was just the nub of the argument: Why the fuss about poverty while most poverty could be eliminated by raising payments under existing programs above what the Government defined as the poverty level?

The point, once made, is terribly persuasive. It eliminates the need for setting up a new agency with thousands of employes, it eliminates the need for new and complex and inevitably confusing systems of coordination, and it would not have led to the inflation in the salaries of social workers and other poverty fighters which is now becoming an issue in a number of antipoverty programs.

WHY then was this course not taken? As to the reasons for the fundamental political decisions, one can only speculate, and one assumes that it would have been something of a dud to implement a new war on poverty with increased Social Security and welfare payments. A war should be more active than that, and welfare payments are not particularly popular with Congress. Furthermore, we were interested in increasing productivity, not in simply raising levels of maintenance.

On the other hand, in view of the great concentration of children and old people in poverty, our only possible hope of improving life for many is simply to increase their level of material comfort. In addition, it may well be that the future productivity of children when they become adult workers can be enhanced by increased money payments permitting better health, more expenditure for toys and magazines and books, trips to downtown and other broadening experiences.

But there were more than these considerations dictating the decision to set up a new agency: There was a good deal of dissatisfaction with old agencies. This dissatisfaction united right and left together against simply pumping money into old agencies, and when right and left are united, it is irresistibly attractive to propose something new both might unite on. Thus, conservatives do not like welfare agencies because they are expensive and encourage dependency; liberals and radicals dislike them because their requirements restrict freedom and their administration is careful, dull, unimaginative and bureaucratic. Big-city education departments — which to a management expert might seem to be ideal conduits for funds which now flow through the Office of Economic Opportunity under various names, such as Operation Head Start, but which all have education as a major component—are subject to the same criticism. In more muted form, one hears much the same about state employment offi-

The antipoverty program combined on a new agency because it was in revolt against professionalism — the professionalism of welfare agencies, of vocational education, of employment services, all of which had coexisted too comfortably with poverty. The revolt was signaled by such works as Michael Harrington's "The Other America" and Edgar May's "The Wasted Americans."

In addition to socialists and journalists, many social workers, too, were critical of the public agencies. For some years, progressive social workers had been attacking the public agencies for a number of faults—their inability to cooperate in handling a "multi-problem" family or individual, their emphasis on their specific function as against all the client's needs, their insistence on professional qualifications for workers (making it difficult for them to absorb new views from outsiders), their limited, middle-class orientation in dealing with the problems of lower-class people. The work of the Ford Foundation, which established public-private corporations in a number of cities in the early nineteen-sixties to develop multipronged attacks on social problems, reflected this criticism, as did the work of the President's Committee on Juvenile Delinquency.

Under this attack by liberal and radical critics, the defense of the education and welfare agencies was that they were not given enough money and freedom by legislatures to do a good job. This sounded weak and unconvincing — though there was a good deal of truth in it—and the last thing a progressive critic could bring himself to do was to propose simply giving them more money. And so the Office of Economic Opportunity came into being, with new people and new programs.

But if there already exist —as there do in most communities—departments of education and vocational education, school counseling services and vocational counseling services, welfare departments and public-health departments, and many more public and private agencies, what are these new programs, created in dissatisfaction with the old ones, to do? Here we come to the third major decision of the antipoverty program, and the one that is most controversial. The new programs were to be Community Action Programs. And what is a Community Action Program or Community Action Agency (C.A.A.)? The fact is that no one is as yet very clear what it is, although some 700 are in existence.

LET us begin to approach the Community Action Program the way the blind men approached the elephant, and see if we can make some sense of it.

Historically, it grows out of those joint attacks on social problems financed by the Ford Foundation, the President's Committee on Juvenile Delinquency and the National Institute of Mental Health in the early nineteen-sixties. The best-known example perhaps is still Mobilization for Youth on New York's Lower East Side. The idea was that the problems of low-income people are all interrelated; therefore, an integrated and interrelated program is needed to attack them. Some of these original agencies have now become the C.A.A.'s of their respective communities, or have become the action agencies to which the C.A.A.'s distribute funds.

Administratively, a C.A.A. can be almost anything: It can be public, private or a mixture. It must include representatives of the people in the areas in which it will concentrate, the "target" areas, but these may or may not be poor. The poor people may be a majority of the board of the agency, as in San Francisco, or less than a majority, as in most places, or there may be hardly any of them at all. They may be chosen through elections in the target areas, through appointment by the Mayor—or someone else—or through negotiations among various organizations representing the poor. Administratively, the Community Action Program is the farthest thing possible from Federal uniformity.

Functionally, a C.A.A. may simply support programs proposed by social-work agencies, boards of education and job-counseling and placement agencies. But it can do a lot of other things, too. In particular, it can organize communities; indeed, one part of a Community Action Program is generally labeled "community organization."

Politically, the Community Action Program can be a feather in the Mayor's cap, as he demonstrates his vigorous attack on the community's problems—or it can provide political resources, in the form of paid organizers, offices, mimeograph machines and paper supplies, for a variety of groups, and thus frighten political leaders out of their wits. What will all those organizers be up to? Their activities may begin innocuously: They organize the people on a block to discuss their problems, but they may go on to organizing a rent strike against slumlords, or even to throwing garbage on the Mayor's lawn in protest against poor garbage collections. And they may go on to educating the poor to believe that the power structure is against them and will be moved only by militant organization and outrageous actions.

It depends, of course, on who the organizers are. The young men and women who would like to organize in the slums and who are hired as community organizers by these programs are often strongly influenced by the New Left criticism of American society as overstructured, overorganized, restrictive of freedom, hardly democratic and in need of a thorough shaking up. This may not be what the organizers of Community Action Programs have in mind—but it is certainly what many people working in them have in mind.

Financially, the Community Action Program amounts to 1 per cent or 2 per cent of a city's budget, and is hardly enough to make any dent in its needs for schools, welfare, police, parks, public housing and a hundred other city services. And, by law, it cannot be used simply to supplement these budgets—into which it would disappear with hardly any effect. It is, however, supposed to do things which aid the poor—and most of these things bring it into conflict with the older agencies.

Socially, then, the Community Action Program is almost designed to increase conflict. It will organize the poor, and not under the auspices of the schools or the police or the public-housing authorities. It is not a means to create tame P.-T.A.'s, tame P.A.L.'s, tame tenants' councils. It will organize the poor to put pressure on the principals and teachers, the police and the welfare authorities, the public-housing managers and the housing inspectors.

Unquestionably, it is giving a new voice to the poor. From the point of view of city officials, it is a question whether they need that voice in addition to the vote. From the point of view of the organizers, it is changing the face of American society by redistributing power, and they fear the powerholders will find out and stamp out the community organization. From the point of view of the poor themselves, it is a great deal of sound and fury which has not as yet affected any of the basic circumstances of their lives—their jobs or lack of them, their housing, their welfare and Social Security payments—but which promises to do so.

Ideologically, the Community Action Program is based on an analysis of what ails the poor. The analysis asserts that it is not their obvious material lack which is the heart of their problem. It is their lack of power. The vote does not give them power, because it needs education and money and time and social and organizational skills to organize the vote, and the poor do not have these. The imbalance is to be redressed by community organization. The effect, it is hoped, will be to improve education, welfare service and housing inspection, to make the police more respectful, to open up new job opportunities and eventually, through the increase in power, to change the pattern of rewards and services distributed by the public agencies.

This is, then, the grand design of the Community Action Program. It is only in its initial stages and, by its very nature, one cannot predict where it is going or what it will do, for it is designed to evoke a distinctive response in each community. Ideally, it brings into the concert of city government new voices and new powers which will be able to affect city programs so that they operate more humanely and more effectively. In doing so, it must also give opportunities to more radical forces which do not have such limited meliorative ends in view.

It is a grand spectacle, not simply of democracy at work, but of democracy trying to stimulate the response that makes it work better. The danger is that the degree of order that any social system needs will be undermined. The hope is that a creative disorder will ensue, one that permits welfare agencies to work better, and with a larger participation from their clients.

IF we now step back and ask, as Congress will be asking soon, how the antipoverty program is working, I would say as well as permitted by the key decisions that were made when the program was set up—with the concurrence of Congress. But the antipoverty program has by no means as yet proved that those initial decisions were right. It was wrong, I think, to hinge so much of the program on work preparation and work training, and so little on those fundamental programs of social welfare and social insurance that every advanced nation finds it needs to combat deprivation and suffering.

Thus we should have given a much sharper look at our programs of social welfare and social insurance, which are many times larger than the antipoverty program. What revisions are necessary in their levels of support, the nature of Federal contributions to them, their varied requirements and regulations?

At the same time we should have devoted more effort to the creation of jobs, for no economically advanced nation today can tolerate the high unemployment rate with which—even after our five years of prosperity—we continue to live. There have been suggestions as to how we can simultaneously reduce unemployment and increase the level of public services—keeping museums and libraries open at night, doubling mail deliveries, providing attendants in playgrounds and parks. (It is because the Neighborhood Youth Corps provides so much clearly useful work that it may turn out to be one of the most successful and least expensive parts of the poverty program.)

We still have this course open to us, and there is no question that, if we follow it, we will still need at least as much job training and job counseling as is now provided through the poverty program. But training and counseling will become infinitely more effective if we have a tighter employment situation, so that the rewards of training and counseling become immediately evident.

NOR am I sure that the second and third decisions—the creation of a separate agency and the emphasis on Community Action Programs—were correct. The two were closely linked, for while all the other programs in the poverty program could be placed under the Department of Labor or the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, it was not easy to find a home in the established structure of government for Community Action—in part because, as we have seen, one of its main aims was to create conflicts with older, established agencies and programs.

I am convinced conflict can be healthy. I am less convinced that government can successfully support the healthy conflict with its own programs and agencies that produces change. The labor movement had help from the Federal Government in the nineteen-thirties, but it could scarcely have developed its distinctive role in the American economy and society if it had been financed by the Government.

There is a wonderful naiveté about the Community Action Program—as if someone had been convinced by a sociologist that change and reform are spurred by conflict and decided that, since all good things can come from the American Government, it ought to provide conflict, too. But in trying to do so we enter on an incredibly difficult path, one which few administrators, I think, can successfully traverse.

The decisions the administrators of these programs must

SOLUTIONS TO LAST WEEK'S DIAGRAMLESS PUZZLES

"I think the performance [of the anti-poverty program], in view of the difficulties of the script as I have outlined them, is better than we had a right to expect."

make are too difficult for almost any mortal. Does one offer jobs in the program to the newly aroused leaders of the poor—and, if so, is one strengthening the program or buying off the leaders of the poor and reducing the pressure? How much pressure does one put on the Mayor to include the representatives of the poor—and is one seeking easy demagogic victories by posing as the leader of the unfortunates against the soulless bureaucracies, or is one really trying to improve the workings of the bureaucracies? And what about the representatives of the poor one is trying to place on C.A.A.'s—is one simply aiding one faction in the Negro community or the civil-rights struggle as against another? Or is one truly changing the fundamental constitution of American local government?

Perhaps the most troublesome aspect of the Community Action Programs is the conflict between the ideology of local control over local programs designed for local problems and the reality of strong Federal control. There is something disingenuous about a program which asserts that we are going to permit each community to design the antipoverty program it needs, and then says: "But hold on; you don't have enough representatives of the poor; they are not chosen in the right way; your program has too much Community Action and not enough Operation Head Start," and so on. In other words, there is a strain between the theoretical commitment to local independence and the reality of Federal control.

The accents may be those of the poor, but the contents of the programs are too often those proposed by Federal officials influenced by the latest wave of fashion among social critics and social workers. I am not yet convinced the Federal officials will uniformly have a better grasp of the local problems than the local elected officials; they may simply have more power because they control the Federal purse strings.

WHAT were the alternatives to the Community Action Program? Just as I believe we could have gotten—and can still get—more mileage in overcoming poverty through major revisions in Social Security and public welfare, so I believe we should at least consider the possibility of giving untied funds directly to city governments. City government today is too often restricted by insufficient tax resources, on the one hand, and by legal commitments and state and Federal requirements which limit how it can spend its money, on the other.

Freeing city government for a more creative role has its dangers, of course, and yet it might produce the kind of ferment the Community Action Program aims at—as city government becomes something worth fighting over, as new Federal funds expand its possibilities of action. And this conflict might be more creative in the end than the present fights over Community Action Program funds, with Federal referees in the background—and often in the foreground.

My reservations about the antipoverty program are much like those of the critic who says the subject of the play should have been a different one. We decided what the subject should be in passing the Economic Opportunity Act, and I think the performance, in view of the difficulties of the script as I have outlined them, is better than we had a right to expect. But I think we still have to take on the jobs which the antipoverty program, as set up under the act, did not address itself to—reducing the unemployment rate, increasing the number of jobs, expanding and revising the Social Security and social-welfare systems, improving the systems of job training, job counseling and job placement, attacking the failures of school systems and police systems. The antipoverty program will permit us to experiment with a good number of ways of undertaking these tasks. In the end, however, a democratic polity cannot take the position that the major way to improve its institutions of government and welfare is to finance guerrilla warfare against them. It must take up the job of directly improving and transforming them.

JOHNSON OFFERS HIS HEALTH PLAN

NYT 3/2/66

Far-Reaching Program Asks Full Care and Education to the Nation's Capacity

FEDERAL PROGRAMS

By JOHN D. POMFRET

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 1—President Johnson sent to Congress today a potentially far-reaching program to improve the nation's health care services and recommendations to expand aid to education.

If Mr. Johnson gets everything he seeks in his message, it will affect a vast array of people—from pre-school children to alcoholics, from elementary, high school and college students to the elderly sick.

Two major cutbacks were also proposed by Mr. Johnson in his message on domestic health and education. These would revise drastically the Federal school milk and lunch program and reduce aid to so-called federally impacted areas—those where schools must educate large numbers of children of Federal employes because of the presence of military or other facilities. These proposals are expected to produce the most controversy on Capitol Hill.

Two 'Ambitious' Goals

In outlining his proposals, Mr. Johnson set these "ambitious" goals for the future:

¶Good health for every citizen to the limits of the country's capacity to provide it.

¶Full education for every citizen to the limits of his capacity to absorb it.

Mr. Johnson noted that his Federal Health budget request for the fiscal year beginning July 1 was $4.67-billion — up nearly $1-billion over the current fiscal year.

The new programs Mr. Johnson proposed account for only a relatively small part of this increase — $41-million — but this is only the first-year request for programs that would expand in future years.

One major new program is designed to encourage the modernization of obsolete hospitals in urban areas through Federal loans and grants. Under it, $5-million would be set aside in the year beginning July 1 to underwrite the costs of planning to update aging hospitals.

In the following year the Government would gurantee 90 per cent of the value of mortgages of up to $975-million for hospital renovation and, over 10 years, would pay 40 per cent of the amount guaranteed, or $351-million. Again, in the following year, costs of additonal renovation programs to an as yet undecided amount would be underwritten on the same basis by the Government.

Declaring that "the need for modernization goes beyond the bricks and mortar of construction," Mr. Johnson also proposed a five-year program of grants for research and demonstration projects in the organization, financing, use and delivery of health services.

The purpose of these grants, which would cost $15-million in the coming fiscal year, would be to find new ways to lower the cost and raise the quality of health care; to organize health services more efficiently, and to develop better methods of sharing health information.

A third major new program recommended by the President is aimed at developing comprehensive public health planning and services in states and communities. Mr. Johnson voted that the Federal Goverment now offers grants to states for programs dealing with specific diseases.

"This leads to an unnecessarily rigid and compartmentalized approach to health problems," Mr. Johnson said.

Comprehensive Services

He proposed first that Federal grants be made to states to plan the better use of manpower, facilities and financial resources to provide comprehensive public health services. These would amount to $10-million in the year beginning July 1.

In the following fiscal year, Mr. Johnson recommended, there should be a program to begin a new system of matching grants for comprehensive public health services. At the same time, in recognition of the fact that some diseases pose important problems in some parts of the country and not in others, there would be further grants to states, communities, medical schools and hospitals to deal with these special health problems. The amounts of the grants for these two programs have not been specified.

Mr. Johnson's fourth recommendation for a new program was to provide grants for training in the allied health professions, which, he said, are "critically understaffed." These include medical technologists, biomedical engineers, dental hygienists and other college-trained health workers.

The grants, totaling $8-million in the coming fiscal year, would go to construction and improvement of training facilities. They would also provide student fellowships for advanced training and stimulate institutions to develop new types of health personnel.

Agency Reorganization

The president also said he intended to submit to Congress soon a proposed reorganization of the health functions of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare. He said that the budget of the United States Public Health Service had grown from $250-million to $2.4-billion in the last 12 years, "yet major elements of the basic structure of the Public Health Service remain set by a law that is more than 20 years old."

Mr. Johnson said he had instructed that a center for research on the cause, prevention, control and treatment of alcoholism be set up in the Public Health Service.

"Even with the present limited state of our knowledge," the President said, "much can be done to reduce the untold suffering and uncounted waste caused by this affliction."

On the education front, Mr. Johnson proposed a new program to help communities plan school construction to encourage innovation in educational methods and to deal with obsolescence, overcrowding and special problems such as de facto school segregation.

Planning grants the first year would total $5-million. Such a grant would enable a school system faced with the problem of de facto school segregation to plan a science education center for high school students to which both Negro and white children would go for special studies.

Mr. Johnson proposed that the Elementary and Secondary Education Act be extended for four years, with increased funds for each section of the act as already indicated by his budget. He asked that the coverage of the act be enlarged by raising from $2,000 to $3,000 the family income ceiling for apportioning Federal aid under the act. The new formula would go into effect July 1, 1967.

Eliminating Districts

The President recommended several changes in the federally impacted area program, the net effect of which would be to eliminate aid to 1,200 of the 4,100 school districts that now get it and reduce the amount to the others. The cost would be reduced from $466-million to $206-million a year.

The Head Start program designed to give poor children training before they enter school should be nearly doubled to take care of 210,000 children in full-year programs and 500,000 in summer programs, Mr. Johnson said. This would raise the budget of this program from $170-million to $300-million in the next fiscal year.

Finally, the President said that he had instructed the Department of Health, Education and Welfare to develop some new social statistics to chart such items as the state of the nation's health and the elimination of illiteracy so "we can better measure the distance we have come and plan for the way ahead."

$2.3 Billion for Slum Plan Inadequate, Capitol Fears

AC 3/1/66 FEDERAL PROGRAMS

By ROBERT B. SEMPLE JR.

(Copyright 1966 by the New York Times Co.)

WASHINGTON — There is growing concern here that the demonstration cities program, on which President Lyndon B. Johnson has pinned his hopes for clearing up city slums, cannot work unless substantially more money is poured into the plan itself or existing federal aid programs.

Key members of the housing subcommittee of the House Banking and Currency Committee have reached this conclusion after a week of testimony on the much-publicized plan.

Under the President's plan, a city applying for federal aid would select one or possibly two blighted neighborhoods and submit an overall plan for their rejuvenation.

$2.3 BILLION FUND

Cities meeting broad federal criteria including need and administrative capability, would be eligible for a share of $2.3 billion in federal aid, spread over five years.

The President's message said that 60 to 70 cities would be chosen to participate in the demonstration program.

A survey of committee sentiment suggests that most members accept the administration view that the plan is an imaginative and long overdue approach to solving slum problems.

But they are afraid that $2.3 billion is not nearly enough to fulfill the program's promises.

COURSES OPEN

One course is to increase funds for the program, or, alternatively, decrease the multitude of programs that are expected to be used as part of the demonstration cities plan.

A second is to scale down the number of cities involved in the plan.

A third is to revise downward the expectations of the plan, by limiting the funds available to each participating city.

These largely unexpected dilemmas have arisen in the past week for three main reasons:

First, the committee has heard repeated testimony, especially from big-city mayors, that if the program, as Johnson promises, makes available to demonstration cities the "complete array of all available grants and aids" it will tend to divert these funds away from those communities that do not participate in the program.

FEAR NEW PRESSURE

Secondly, some committee members feel that the problem of diversion or discrimination could be aggravated by the inclusion, in the administration bill, of a financing mechanism that would tend to encourage cities competing for the demonstration funds to put still further pressure on existing federal programs.

Third, there is a growing feeling in the committee and among housing experts in the capital that the administration badly underestimated the cost of certain important "social" aspects of the program; and that, as a result, the $2.3 billion requested by the President is grossly inadequate to do the kind of job he set out to do.

POWELL PROPOSES A LITERACY DRIVE

FED PROGRAMS

His Plan Raises a Threat to James Farmer's Program

3/8/66

By JOSEPH A. LOFTUS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 7 — Representative Adam Clayton Powell advocated today a broad, new program to conquer adult illiteracy.

James Farmer, another Negro leader, has proposed a more modest antipoverty project along the same lines, but Mr. Powell's move appeared to dim Mr. Farmer's chances considerably.

Mr. Powell, a Manhattan Democrat, is chairman of the Education and Labor Committee that begins hearings tomorrow on the third-year needs of the antipoverty program. Today he said he would offer an amendment commanding the Health, Education and Welfare Department to mobilize the resources of all public and private agencies in the attack on adult illiteracy.

Mr. Powell brushed off a question about Mr. Farmer's project as a matter for "administrative decision." At the same time, he said that the war against illiteracy had been waged for a long time by the Health, Education and Welfare Department and it would be "a mistake to set up another group."

Funds Were Ready

The chairman's project would call for a large but unspecified sum. The Office of Economic Opportunity, the antipoverty agency, was about to grant Mr. Farmer $780,000.

Mr. Farmer had quit as national director of the Congress of Racial Equality and was about to buy a house in Washington when he caught the scent of adversity.

"I am delighted to see the Congressman join the war on illiteracy," Mr. Farmer said i New York when informed of Mr. Powell's project.

He insisted hewas not discouraged, and said he would withhold further comment until he had studied Mr. Powell's plan. He acknowledged that he had called off the house purchase.

Wide Program Planned

Mr. Farmer had proposed setting up a center frm which he would direct the literacy program in 18 communities in the first year. He proposed raising a million dollars in private fund to supplement the O.E.O. grant.

Associates of Mr. Farmer said that Mr. Powell's office had bee informed "from the inception" of the project and said they knew of no reason why he would try to pre-empt the entire field in the fight on illiteracy.

The White House has shown a continuing, though private, interest in Mr. Farmer's project.

Mr. Powell and other well-placed members of Congress have exercised almost day-by-day overview of the antipoverty program and have influenced many administrative decisions.

Sargent Shriver, the O.E.O. director, is inhibited more than most Government administrators because Congress has limited his authorization to a year at a time, although it is known that the Administration contemplates a longer range program.

That limitation has forced Mr. Shriver to march up the Hill every year not only to the Appropriations Committee but also to Mr. Powell's legislative committee, as well.

Meantime, two Republicans on the Education and Labor Committee introduced a bill calling for a complete overhaul of the program.

Representatives Albert H. Quie of Minnesota and Charles E. Goodell of upstate New York proposed the Opportunity Crusade Act of 1966 to "Mesh the combined efforts of Government at all levels with private endeavors to provide jobs and dignity for the poor."

Shriver Cuts Funds In Poverty Elections

FED. PROGRAMS

AJ 3/10/66

By EVE EDSTROM
Washington Post News Service

WASHINGTON, March 10 — Sargent Shriver has all but ordered a shut-off of federal funds to support elections of the poor to local antipoverty boards.

"We don't believe we received our money's worth in these elections," Shriver told a House subcommittee.

This was quite a shift from last year when Shriver's aides were closely watching local elections of the poor and hailing them as bold social experiments to obtain the antipoverty legislation's goal of "maximum feasible participation" of the poor.

But when Rep. Adam Clayton Powell (D-N.Y.) opened hearings this week on the administration's $1.75 billion antipoverty bill, Shriver said that the elections of the poor represented an untried weapon of the poverty war that had been tested and had proven to be "disappointing."

MOST RECENTLY, he said his Office of Economic Opportunity provided $61,000 to support an election of the poor in Los Angeles and less than 1 per cent of the eligible voters cast ballots. Only slightly better results came in Kansas City, Cleveland and Chester, Pa.

Shriver's prepared testimony then went on to say:

"The facts are that it is highly unlikely that we will provide federal funds to a local community for future poverty area elections."

In his delivery, Shriver changed that sentence to say, "We are prepared to consider looking into the possibility of discontinuing such elections at least at the expense of the federal government."

In recent months, the notion of "maximum feasible participation" of the poor by the election process has been under attack by city halls that do not want to lose control of antipoverty funds.

This issue figured prominently in Los Angeles where Shriver appeared to blame the apathy of the poor for the disappointing results. However, before Shriver testified, subcommittee member Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.) said Los Angeles difficulties stemmed largely from the fact that federal antipoverty officials have "aided and abetted" self-seeking politicians.

HAWKINS, whose congressional district is in the Watts area that was torn by riots last summer, said Los Angeles' antipoverty effort is an "awful mess" because of the "great fight" that is going on between the poor and the politicians. Too often, he said Shriver's aides have encouraged local officials who have no concept of what it means to involve the poor.

Another Democrat on the subcommittee, Rep. James H. Scheuer (N.Y.), was highly critical of previous "disastrous" antipoverty efforts in New York City, where "not a single community progress center has opened up."

House Okays $2.5 Billion For Rent Aid, Teacher Corps

Ne 3/30/66

WASHINGTON (AP) — In a smashing victory for the Johnson administration, the House sent to the Senate Tuesday an omnibus $2.5 billion appropriation bill containing funds for rent subsidies and the Teacher Corps.

Republican efforts to eliminate money for the two new Great Society programs approved but not financed by Congress last year were beaten back. So was a GOP attempt to eliminate additional funds for impacted school districts.

The bill was sent to the Senate by roll-call vote after sharp partisan debate.

Republicans warned of inflation and tax increases and Democrats accused the GOP of being unmindful of the needs of the nation's poor people.

The rent subsidy money, kept in the bill earlier by a standing vote of 183 to 153, remained in on a later roll-call count of 198 to 190. There was no roll-call vote on the Teacher Corps fund.

The roll-call vote on final passage was 369 to 122. Voting to keep the rent supplements in the bill were 192 Democrats and six Republicans. Voting for the amendment to knock them out were 65 Democrats and 125 Republicans.

Most of the money, $240,679,600 less than President Lyndon B. Johnson requested, is for use during the remainder of the fiscal year ending June 30. Additional financing for the programs involved will be included in later measures for the new fiscal year.

There was no controversy over some of the larger allotments, including: the cost of pay raises voted last year for military and civilian federal employes; aid for elementary and secondary education; advances to the fund for health insurance for the elderly; welfare grants to states; and new veterans' benefit programs.

The bill provided the first outright test of what might be in store for the President's domestic programs during the remainder of the year, since it was the first non-defense money bill of 1966.

Republicans have called for cuts in all new programs and for curtailment of some older projects because of the rising cost of the war in Viet Nam.

The bill provides $10 million to start the Teacher Corps project and $12 million for the rent subsidy program, both amounts less than Johnson asked.

The rent program is designed to provide better housing for low income groups by paying part of the rent to non-profit organizations that construct the housing.

The Teachers Corps program would provide additional educational help for children of poor families by paying the salaries of persons who helped tutor the children outside their regular classes.

A restriction attached to the Teacher Corps allotment would require local communities to pay at least 10 per cent of the cost. Since the money provided is for use during the remaining months of the fiscal year ending June 30, the program hardly could be put into operation during the present school year.

A restriction on the rent subsidy money would limit its use to projects officially approved by local communities. Opponents of the restriction claimed it would keep minority groups from obtaining better housing in suburbs of large cities.

Rights Hearing Focuses on Negro Ghetto in North

By JOHN HERBERS
Special to The New York Times

CLEVELAND, April 3 — The children of Hough walked through a spring snowfall today carrying small bags of groceries past garbage and debris into dark, cavernous buildings.

"That's the way it is this time of month," a corner grocer said. "You see, it's been more than three weeks since the last Mother's Day and they are buying on a meal-to-meal basis—even on Sunday."

The 10th of each month, when welfare checks for aid-to-dependent children are received, is celebrated in the ghetto as Mother's Day. The checks provide a major source of income for the people of Hough.

What distinguishes Hough from a host of other Northern ghettoes is that the United States Commission on Civil Rights is here investigating its decay.

The hearings, which opened Friday and will run for four more days, mark a shift of emphasis for the commission. Since 1957, when it was organized, the commission has been concerned largely with problems facing the Southern Negro.

'Increasing in Complexity'

Dr. John A. Hannah chairman and president of Michigan State University, said at the first public hearing yesterday in the Liberty Hill Baptist Church:

"This is the first of a new series of hearings the commission will hold to seek the facts concerning civil rights problems affecting Negro citizens and other minorities living in the inner city. Such problems are increasing in complexity in the urban centers of the North as well as the South."

Dr. Hannah pointed out that the commission was only looking for "problems that are representative of problems elsewhere in the nation." Nevertheless, Cleveland leaders have voiced some concern that the commission, as one put it, "would publicize our faults without pointing out all the good things we've done."

Mayor Ralph Locher

Mayor Ralph Locher took the occasion to point out some of the problems he was having.

A group of mayors, he said, were meeting with President Johnson a few days ago, and "the President said we should take another look at our expenditures" so as not to overheat the economy.

Paradox Is Seen

"On the one hand we're told to spend [to build a Great Society] and on the other hand we are told not to spend anything that is not essential because the economy can't quite stand it," he declared.

"We could be known," he continued, "as the generation which put a man on the moon while standing ankle-deep in garbage."

The first witnesses graphically described the day-to-day horrors of Hough. They said Federal programs such as urban renewal only seemed to be increasing the blight and that nothing done locally had been of much help.

Thirty-four per cent of Cleveland's 811,000 residents are Negroes and by 1970 the ratio is expected to reach 40 per cent. Almost half of Negroes now living here were born in the South.

All but 1 per cent live on the East Side, which is divided from the West Side by the central business district and the industrial complex in the Cuyahoga River Valley.

The commission said a preliminary investigation showed that even on the East Side "the population continues to be rigidly segregated" and that there was "strong evidence that the isolation of Negroes in urban ghettoes is on the increase."

Deterioration Is Cited

Morris Thorington Jr., a delicatessen owner, told the commission that as the demand for housing had grown, owners had divided and redivided living units to increase rentals, until deterioration reached the point where many buildings had either been abandoned or taken over by urban renewal.

He said that many businesses had closed and that his, in the center of the blight area, had declined rapidly.

The quality of the schools declined with the neighborhood, Mr. Thorington continued. He said he thought his children were receiving an adequate education until two years ago when two of them transferred to suburban schools.

"There was no comparison," he said. "My daughter was the brightest in her class in Hough but upon transfer she found it twice as difficult."

Mrs. Hattie Mae Dugan, a 30-year-old mother of one daughter who receives $118 a month in aid-to-dependent children and pays $60 a month for a tiny, cold-water flat, said she had not been able to find anyone to complain to, even when water ran through the rooms.

Mrs. Dugan was one of four civil rights demonstrators arrested last August when they put dead rats on the steps of City Hall. The rats came from Hough.

"They used to crawl into bed with me," Mrs. Dugan said.

Several other witnesses testified that vacant buildings, lots and uncollected garbage contributed to the rat problem, which had become severe in recent months.

Birch Society Denounced By G.O.P. in Minnesota

MINNEAPOLIS, April 2 (AP)—The executive council of the Minnesota Republican party voted Saturday to reject the "methods, tactics and organization of the John Birch Society," which it compared to the Communist party.

The vote was unanimous, according to the Republican state chairman, George Thiss. He added, "This is now the Minnesota Republican party position."

The council's resolution said that the ultraconservative Birch Society "is attempting to clothe itself with the respectability of both major political parties" and that its tactics, methods and organization "closely resemble those of the Communist party."

FEDERAL PROGRAMS

$36 Million in U.S. Funds Aid State School Projects

AC 5/8/66

By TOM GREENE

Georgia's school systems have taken advantage of the new federal Elementary and Secondary Education Act to start new programs and expand old ones, to the tune of over $36 million.

Under Title I of the act, which provided Georgia an allocation of over $37 million during the current fiscal year, most of the state's school systems have set up an estimated 277 different projects which they did not have before, or expanded old programs.

The portion of the allocated money not used reverts back to the federal government. But one state school official said Georgia's record of approved Title I projects ranks better than most states.

The approved projects include such things as the establishment of kindergartens, remedial reading programs, expanded library services, school nurses, social workers, psychological services, extra teachers, counselors, reading and other specialists and audio visual and other special equipment, including television sets.

LAST TUESDAY was the deadline for applying for projects under Title I. R. C. Beemon, coordinator of Title I projects for the State Department of Education, said then that 251 projects had been approved for an allocation of $34,794,525, and 26 more were pending approval with requests for funds totaling $1,403,267.

These allocations are only for the current fiscal year, but many of the projects will extend into the summer months, with a deadline of Aug. 31. Their continuation after that depends upon further allocation of funds by Congress.

Apparently, refusal of some systems to sign the recently issued new federal desegregation guidelines will not affect their receiving these funds. The U.S. Office of Education has threatened to cut off federal funds for new projects to those systems which do not comply with the guidelines. But most of these projects were approved before the deadline for signing the guidelines compliance forms passed at midnight Friday.

But Mr. Beemon said that those systems operating summer programs under Title I still have to abide by the Civil Rights act.

THE AMERICUS system, which previously announced it would not sign the guidelines compliance forms, has an approved project under Title I totaling $146,220. The program, which will affect 1,019 children, includes addition of teachers and counselors for the system's schools and educational equipment.

But Mr. Beemon said that those systems operating summer programs under Title I still have to abide by the civil rights law, which prohibits racial discrimination.

The Atlanta system received the largest allocation for Title I projects — over $2.3 million.

The Atlanta programs, designed to help 31,180 children, include reading improvement projects, more teachers, librarians, counselors, instructional supervisors, tutorial services, teacher aides, psychological services, in-service training for teachers and new equipment.

Some of the systems, such as Lowndes County, Houston County, Thomas County and DeKalb County, are starting or expanding programs for educable or trainable retarded children.

FEW SYSTEMS in the state now have public education facilities for retarded children, and only about three have public kindergarten programs. Several plan to start kindergartens under Title I.

Most of the emphasis, however, seems to be in remedial work to strengthen children in reading, mathmatics and other areas.

To qualify for Title I money, schools have to have a certain number of children whose families are considered in the low income brackets. However, most of the projects will benefit all the children in a particular school.

It is a lonely place. Life among the migrant farm laborers here, as a social worker said recently, is "like being at the end of the earth." Thirty-nine east is Palm Beach.

¶As a result of all the above, the intensified work of local agencies, like the Florida Christian Migrant Ministry, and of active public health services, like the one in Palm Beach County, where migrants live just west of millionaires' homes.

Care for Children

At the Canal Point camp, where 100 families live, a day-care center for children is being operated by a professional social worker, two Domestic Peace Corps volunteers, a teacher and two teachers' aides recruited from migrant ranks.

Migrant women, who bear from six to nine children on the average, stoop and crawl along the endless rows of vegetables from dawn until dusk beside their men. Until the day-care center was established, mothers had to leave pre-school children to fend for themselves.

"It used to boil my blood to go from the kids each morning," one mother said, "and I was too tired at night to do for them."

Now she leaves her four youngest children at the center at 6 A.M. on her way to the fields and picks them up 12 hours later.

In a cheery redecorated building, an abandoned wreck until last fall, the children eat hot meals, play their first organized games and get their first regular health care from one of the volunteers, a licensed practical nurse.

A few mothers come in weekly for cooking and sewing lessons, and teen-agers use the center as a neighborhood club.

A common sight in the shacks that migrant home management aides have not yet reached is a corner piled with boxes of Government-issue powdered milk. It has not been used, because the migrants do not know how to prepare it.

In a camp at Belle Glade, a migrant "capital" not far from Sand Cut, Mrs. Annie Gray told what a migrant aide's visits meant in showing her how to cook surplus foods.

"She's teaching me a whole lot of things I didn't know, like fixing the food," she said. "Now I fix it so it tastes a whole lot better."

Flora Soto, who came to the mainland from Puerto Rico, spends her winter months at the farm labor camp in coastal Pompano Beach, on the other side of the railroad tracks from what Floridians call their "Fabulous Gold Coast."

Mrs. Soto, who is learning English from a volunteer in her camp, said in Spanish:

"We're learning to be cleaner and how to live better. And best of all, we're being taught how to live so we don't have to move around the country so much."

She was referring to programs that teach migrants new skills enabling them to settle year-round in Florida.

Of migrants based in Florida, 80 per cent are Negro. Most of the rest are Puerto Rican or Mexican-American. In May, they start moving north with the crops. "We're going up the road," they say. Some go as far as the apple orchards of upstate New York or the potato fields of eastern Long Island, in rickety buses or asthmatic cars.

When the crops are harvested up north in October, they return to Florida, the source of the East Coast "migrant stream," to bring in the winter crops. On the average-to-good day, a migrant or seasonal farm worker may make $7 in the fields. If it rains, he cannot work and is paid nothing.

While the antipoverty program reaches all areas where migrants work, more can be done and more Federal money is made available for them in states where they spend more time each year, such as Florida, California and Texas.

Aid for Women and Children

The conditions in which they live vary from decent to unspeakable. The worst migrant camps are on private land and consist of rent-free shacks infested by vermin, without heat or electricity. As many as 15 big families share centrally placed teoilets and showers.

The main targets of the aid program are women and children. Antipoverty officials agree that little can be done to salvage adult male migrants.

"How can we reach them?" one said. "They're out in the fields by sun-up. They don't come back until dusk. By then they're too stunned with fatigue to do anything but eat dinner, get drunk on cheap wine, sleep and make a kid once a year."

The Florida migrant aides invariably get new ideas across to their fellow-migrants faster than any outsider. At the same time, their modest salaries have liberated them from the worst aspects of their migrant conditions.

"Think about the days it rains and the days it doesn't and you'll know about the change the steady salary has made," said Myrtle Walker, a large warm-hearted woman. "It's steady income because it's something that's not rained on."

Nine-Day Special Session Approves Reapportionment

3/13/66

TALLAHASSEE, Fla., March 12 — A special session of the Florida Legislature apparently has accomplished in nine days what past assemblies had failed to do in 10 years—enact a valid plan of reapportionment.

But, the legislature knew it was under the gun. The U.S. Supreme Court had only days earlier thrown out a reapportionment plan, prepared last summer, and ordered that an acceptable apportionment be prepared in time for this year's elections.

In addition, midway of its special session deliberations, federal district court at Miami, again took jurisdiction in the dispute.

The new apportionment formula approved by the special session calls for a Senate of 48 members and a House of

FLORIDA

117 representatives. Gains in membership go to the populous areas.

Dade County (Miami) for instance, the state's most populous, will get eight senators and 22 representatives. Previously, it had two senators and 14 representatives.

THE FLORIDA attorney general's office is confident the plan will pass the U.S. Supreme Court's one man, one vote test. Only one Senate district varies more than 15 per cent of the population normal and only two House districts.

But, just to be on the safe side, Gov. Haydon Burns called on all litigants in pending reapportionment cases before state and federal courts to withdraw their suits and urge district court at Miami to accept the apportioning until the next session.

"I have no reservations on this plan," said Burns, "as it will meet all court tests, but there is still a legal battle as to which has jurisdiction—the Florida Supreme Court or the federal courts — in the reapportionment matter."

Qualifying for the Florida legislature actually ended a day before the special session started. But, the qualifying period has been extended until March 18.

BURNS SAID this will give the candidates ample time to file and run in the regularly scheduled May 3 primary, thus "saving the state and the taxpayers the cost of a special election later on."

Political observer generally agree that Burns' chances for reelection have been greatly enhanced because of the apparently successful legislative reapportionment.

His opponents in the May 3 primary — Robert King High and Scott Kelly — had been critical of Burns calling the reapportionment session, and had accused him of lack of leadership in last summer's meeting which enacted the plan thrown out recently by the nation's highest court.

But, during this special meeting, Burns supplied the leadership he was accused of failing to proivide in last summer's reapportionment session, meeting almost hourly with groups of legislators. Many of Burns' top appointees also worked with the lawmakers.

AT THE TIME Burns called the special session it was agreed that he was taking a gamble. If the legislature failed, this would have given Burns' gubernatorial opponents new ammunition and, perhaps, generated taxpayer resentment, as the special meeting was costing about $12,000 a day.

But, Burns said he acted only after being advised by the cabinet and legislative leaders that the state should make one last effort to reapportion before turning the task over to the federal courts.

While Burns was pleased with the new apportioning, he said he hopes the 1967 session will make some improvements.

Manpower Shortage Eased By Refugees From Castro

By CHARLES F. HESSER

MIAMI, Fla., April 2 —Employers across the U.S. are looking to the Cuban refugees to help solve a manpower shortage.

And the news is welcome indeed as nearly 14,000 refugees have been airlifted to Florida since the new program started Dec. 1. Requests have been made for more than 1 million Cubans —a seventh of the flown to the U.S.

S. M. Fran, placement officer of the Federal Cuban Refugee Center at Miami, said, "I don't think there is a Cuban who could go to a community of any size anywhere in the country right now and fail to find a job, no matter what his skills."

Lowest unemployment in more than a decade, a booming economy, and effects of the war in Viet Nam, plus a generally favorable acceptance of Cuban exiles already employed, are contributing to the rosy work outlook for the refugees.

FRANK ESTIMATES that at least 10,000 job offers have been received from nearly every state in the union, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands and Washington, D.C.

Jobs are open for garment workers, machinists, carpenters, electricians and foundry workers. Small communities are looking for doctors, but these requests are almost impossible to fill as Cuban doctors don't generally meet requirements to practice in this country.

Most of the employment offers have come from Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey and the New England states.

"There are enough job opportunities existing that there should be no problem for a long time," said Frank, although Cubans are arriving in Miami at about the rate of almost 1,000 a week.

EXILES in the U.S. have

applied for 950,000 relatives to be brought over; another 150,000 to 200,000 Cubans have applied in Havana for seats on the flights.

At the current rate of transportation it would take about 25 years to bring over that many.

In Washington, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), chairman of a subcommittee on Refugees and Escapees, expressed concern over the lack of cooperation from Latin nations in accepting some of the refugees. Except for 106, who went to Costa Rica in February, all have come to the U.S. Kennedy has called on the State Department to win more support from the Latin countries in the resettlement program.

BEFORE A Cuban is put on the flight list to the U.S., his record is checked out by the FBI, CIA, the State Department and the Immigration Service. This screening is designed to weed out subversives and criminals. So far, 385 Cubans have been denied admission to the U.S.

John E. McCarthy, director of the National Catholic Welfare Conference's Department of Immigration, is urging that Cuban refugees be given the status of permanent residents.

Exiles from the Castro government are presently in a temporary category known as "parole." McCarthy said Cubans on "parole" who are doctors cannot practice their profession, and skilled workers can't get security clearance for defense work.

Cuban students must pay higher college tuition because they can't be classified as state residents.

Teachers Applying Pressure For Education Improvements

AC 5/1/66

MIAMI, Fla., April 30—Florida teachers are asking the state and its 67 counties to provide an additional $390 million for public schools in the 1967-69 period.

Almost half of the state's $1.1 billion general appropriations budget already is being expended for education.

Teacher delegates to the annual Florida Education Association Convention at Miami Beach proposed that most of the new money—$227 million—be used to increase teacher pay.

The remainder would provide a reduced pupil-teacher ratio in the classrooms, free periods for teachers for lunch and planning and new textbooks and instructional material.

It was said by the FEA that a suggested one-cent increase in the 3-per-cent sales tax—all the proceeds of which would go to education — would not raise the additional revenue requested.

THE DELEGATES urged the Legislature to eliminate loopholes in present tax laws, require equitable property tax assessment throughout the state, provide new tax sources not now authorized, and refrain from reducing local taxes when new state funds are provided.

Also called for by the delegates was a minimum starting salary of $6,000 for teachers.

Other priority demands of the 40,000-member FEA included a law authorizing negotiations between school boards and teacher groups, a strengthening of the continuing contract law and elimination of voting by the public on school tax millage.

STATE SCHOOL Superintendent Floyd Christian called for "an injection of new state support, in an amount, never before contemplated."

He said that Florida citizens are aware of educational needs, but warned:

"If we are to have the full understanding and support of the people of Florida, the lines of communications must be opened wide. Frankly, a little more old-fashioned selling and salesmanship are in order."

He stressed that educators cannot achieve their goals alone and told the FEA delegates, "Let us be careful that we don't run so hard that we lose our following."

School wants have become one of the hottest issues in the governor's race.

GOV. HAYDON BURNS told the delegates he is committed to the "major ideas of FEA legislative proposals. But, without public understanding, sympathy and support, your programs are in peril. With it you can accomplish anything."

Burns got in dutch with the teachers during the 1965 Legislature, when his hold-the-line tax stand knocked out any possibility of a $100 million state school teacher pay raise. Most counties since, however, have raised teacher wages.

While the governor says he will be hard to convince new taxes are needed, he said he would go along with a proposal to increase the sales tax one cent, with the proceeds going to education, if such is the recommendation of a tax reform commission and property taxes are reduced.

Burns' main opponents — Scott Kelly and Robert King High—also have endorsed a stepped up educational program for the state.

Florida Run-Off a Repeat of '64: Burns vs. High for Governorship

Mayor Robert King High

Special to The New York Times

TALLAHASSEE, Fla., May 4—Miami's Mayor Robert King High, who adopted the speaking style of Senator Robert F. Kennedy of New York and hired a Kennedy assistant as a campaign aide, won a run-off position against Gov. W. Haydon Burns in yesterday's Democratic primary in Florida. The second election will be held May 24.

Almost complete unofficial returns showed Governor Burns leading in yesterday's voting with 359,000 to 331,000 for Mayor High. A third major candidate in the race, former State Senator Scott Kelly, had 319,000 votes, and a fourth candidate, Samuel Foor, had 12,000 votes. A runoff is required when no candidate receives a majority in the first balloting.

Mayor High, a 42-year-old lawyer, is considered one of the most liberal politicians in the South and was one of the first Southern political figures to support Federal civil rights legislation.

This will be the second time Mr. High has been in a runoff with Mr. Burns for the Democratic nomination as Governor of Florida. In 1964, Mr. Burns defeated him by over 200,000 votes.

Governor Confers

Governor Burns, who was Mayor of Jacksonville for 16 years before being elected Governor, held a meeting in the Governor's mansion in Tallahassee with top state officials tonight to enlist their support against Mayor High.

Mayor High, who attacked Mr. Burns's administration during the first primary as one of "cronyism," asked Mr. Kelly to support him in the runoff.

But the former State Senator withheld a commitment. Mr. Kelly, who lives in Lakeland in the state citrus center, also ran third in 1964 and thus was not in the runoff. He said today he wanted to wait for an official count of the ballots before making a statement.

Governor Burns told a campaign rally last night that he would "take the gloves off" in the runoff against Mr. High, whom he referred to as an "ultra-liberal" and an "integrationist."

Yesterday's primary was the first in Florida devoid of a racial issue in about 10 years. But last night the Governor said he would win the runoff no matter which candidate he faced.

An 'Ultra-Liberal'

"One is an arch-segregationist, and the other an ultra-liberal, and their supporters cannot go behind the other," the Governor said.

Mr. Burns ran on the record of his first 16 months in office, but spent most of the time defending himself against charges that he channeled state business to campaign contributors who had given more than $2-million for his races for Governor.

Mayor High, who spent $125,000 this year while Governor Burns spent almost $1-million, said he would continue as the "poor man's" candidate and would step up his attacks on the Governor.

Mr. Kelly campaigned on a platform of better education and a large teacher pay raise, and was endorsed by several major education associations.

Claude R. Kirk Jr., an investment banker from Jacksonville, won the Republican nomination with a clear majority and will meet the winner of the Democratic runoff in November.

Mayor High is expected to receive continued support in his runoff campaign from William Haddad of New York City, who helped manage Senator Kennedy's campaign in New York.

Florida Governor Faces Stiffer Test; 3d Man Backs 2d

NYT 5/7/62

MIAMI, May 6 (UPI)—State Senator Scott Kelly, who ran a close third in Florida's Democratic gubernatorial primary, swung his support today to Miami's Mayor Robert High in the runoff, a move that could seriously threaten Gov. Haydon Burns's re-election.

Mr. Burns met the Kelly-High alliance with a charge that Mr. Kelly had first tried to sell him his support for $500,000. Mr. Kelly called the statement "absolutely false."

Senator Kelly's move altered what was expected to be a dull runoff on May 24 with Governor Burns pitted against the man he beat in 1964. Mr. Kelly also ran third in the first 1964 primary but he made no endorsement in the final race, which Mr. Burns won handily.

Governor Burns led the primary on Tuesday with 361,716 votes. Mayor High was second with 332,803 and Mr. Kelly polled 321,592 votes.

The primary this year was a lackluster campaign without strong issues. Governor Burns's charge today changed all that for the runoff.

"If I had any interest in reference to money, certainly I would have gone to the man who spent one-million dollars in the first primary," said Senator Kelly, referring to Mr. Burns.

"I wouldn't have gone to the man who has only spent $140,000."

Mayor High was the smallest spender by far in the first primary.

Governor Burns charged that a $500,000 price tag had been put on Mr. Kelly's support in the runoff. The Governor said that the price dropped over a two-day period to $200,000, then to $150,000, "but we said no deal." He did not say who approached him.

Burns, High Resume Battle They Waged in '64 Runoff

FLORIDA

MIAMI, Fla., May 9—Gov. Haydon Burns and Miami Mayor Robert King High picked up where they left off two years ago — they are again battling for the Florida governorship in a runoff primary.

In the 1964 first primary, Burns racked up a 105,173 vote lead over High and went on to win in the runoff by by 182,546 votes. Burns takes into the current second primary campaign a lead of less than one-third of his total two years ago.

Both candidates are predicting victory in the May 24 runoff. Claude Kirk, Jacksonville banker-merchant, won the GOP nomination for governor and will face the winner of the Burns-High contest in the November general election.

BUT, THE Democratic gubernatorial nomination has been tantamount to election in Florida since Reconstruction days.

The runoff campaign promises to be a spirited contest.

Burns said the biggest difference between the first primary campaign and the runoff "is that I've had to run with kid gloves until now. I didn't want to tap at either High or Kelly (Scott Kelly, third place finisher in the primary) and offend their supporters. Now I will take off my gloves."

High promised to renew his primary campaign attack upon Burns. High called integrity in government the one big overriding issue and accused Burns of paying political debts by giving fat contracts to his friends without competitive bids.

A certain issue will be campaign expenses.

DURING THE first primary campaign, Burns spent in excess of $800,000 compared to about $127,000 for High. The Miami mayor has said repeatedly he would not accept big money that would send him into the governor's office obligated to special interests.

Burns describes himself as the All-Florida governor, claiming credit for the state's current prosperity, for reapportionment of the Legislature, for a record flood of tourists, and for bringing a second Disneyland to the state.

High has won statewide attention for his battles for lower power, telephone and insurance rates and to force the DuPont - controlled Florida East Coast Railway to pay back taxes and resume passenger service on its strike-bound line.

To win back the education forces he had lost with his 1965 hold-the-line tax policy, Burns promises more money for schools in the fuure, including fatter pay checks for teachers.

HIGH SAYS he can raise an additional $500 million for education without a general tax increase by taxing "special interests" and placing all state purchases on a bid basis to bring huge savings.

High was hoping to attract Kelly's endorsement and inherit much of his organization for the second primary fight, while Burns sought to prevent such an alliance.

Education Committee Offers Plea for Sweeping Changes

FLORIDA

MIAMI, Fla., May 14 — A citizens committee, composed of educators and laymen, has upped the demands of the Florida Education Association that Florida catch up on scholastic needs through the expenditure of additional hundreds of millions of dollars.

The committee went so far as to make a plea for carpeted classrooms.

Recommendations of the group — The Governor's Conference on Education — followed a meeting which drew some 1,400 delegates. In a nutshell, the conference said Florida's school system must be lifted from below-average status and geared to meet the needs of the state's space-age industry and commerce.

Said one delegate in a message aimed at Florida's Legislature:

"If you think Florida has lived up to the average among the states in expenditures in proportion to its ability, the facts do not support you."

THE REPORT by the committee urged knocking down the traditional barriers to educational development — restrictions on spending — and proceeding on a progressive, expensive plan to improve public schools.

Throughout the report there were calls for new programs, new foundations, new government agencies and committees — most for the purpose of pouring volumes of new information and tools for teaching into the classroom.

Specific proposals included:

—Increasing the Minimum Foundation Program to assure accreditation of all public schools—kindergarten through junior college.

—A $5,000 minimum salary for teachers, with pay raises coming big enough and often enough to keep education competitive with other professions in pay.

—More specialists in varied educational fields at local and state administrative levels.

—Coordination and expansion of educational television stations across Florida.

—Major expansion of library service.

—Reduction of the pupil-teacher ratio to 20 to 1.

—Establishment of full kindergarten facilities.

—Increasing the number and value of teacher scholarships.

—Building schools first for consideration for the individual, rather than the group.

SAID THE report:

"Because we can now talk about comfort in a school building without feeling guilty of extravagance, we must study the possibility of carpeting for new schools. We must rediscover the floor."

No price-tag was placed on the massive new program, but committee members had a number of ideas where additional funds might come from.

There is a prohibition in Florida's constitution against a state income tax. There was considerable interest among the delegates for an income tax.

There is now a provision for a $5,000 homestead exemption in Florida's constitution. There was support to modify the exemption.

Other ideas included a proposal to "revamp or increase" the limited three per cent sales tax with benefits going to education, a transaction tax, a fee for school attendance, a tax on pollution, and a severance tax.

Powell Endorses Miami Mayor, But the Mayor Cries It's No Fair

FLORIDA 5/17/66

By MARTIN WALDRON

Special to The New York Times

TALLAHASSEE, Fla., May 16 — Mayor Robert King High of Miami rejected today an endorsement given him in the Florida Governor's race by Representative Adam Clayton Powell.

Mr. High called the endorsement a "set-up," adding: "I don't know Adam Clayton Powell, and he doesn't know me. I have never even talked to him. I do not want his endorsement. It is not welcomed and was not soliciated."

The Manhattan Democratic Representative flew into Miami late yesterday. He told reporters that he had come to meet with labor leaders. Then he volunterred his endorsement of Mr. High.

"If I were a Florida citizen, black or white, I would be behind High to show the nation and the world that Florida is not just another Wallace domain," Mr. Powell said.

The comment about the "Wallace domain" was a reference to Gov. George C. Wallace of Alabama, a segregationist.

No Labor Meeting

Mr. Powell's endorsement of Mayor High came during routine questioning about civil rights.

After the news conference, Mr. Powell left Miami for Washington without meeting with labor leaders and without leaving the airport.

The Representative's office had called Miami newspapers and radio and television stations to say that Mr. Powell was coming to Miami late Sunday to meet with labor leaders to discuss a picketing bill now pending in Congress.

Gov. Haydon Burns, run-off opponent for Mr. High for the Democratic nomination, said in Jacksonville, where he campaigned today, that he had had nothing to do with Mr. Powell's endorsement of Mayor High.

"The Congressman was just following the lead of the Senator from New York," said Gov. Burns.

The Governor has repeatedly charged that Mayor High's campaign is being directed by Senator Robert F. Kennedy, Democrat of New York.

Last week, Governor Burns brought the race issue into the campaign for the fisst time, urging Florida voters to "follow the lead of Alabama and defeat the bloc votes."

Mayor High said his staff was attempting to learn exactly how Mr. Powell's trip to Miami came about.

A 'Strange' Incident

"Isn't it strange that this man came all the way to Florida to endorse me when I have had no contact with him?" asked Mayor High. "Powell knows that his endorsement will be harmful to any candidate. I am sure that every Floridian knows that this endorsement was calculated to hurt me. I know it and Powell knows it."

In Washington, Mr. Powell's office called the endorsement "a very casual thing."

Charles Stone, an assistant who was with the Representative, said Mr. Powell did not consider the Florida Governor's race of "too much importance."

"He did not go down there to endorse anybody," said Mr. Stone. "He went down to discuss the situs picketing bill because he has had a lot of mail from Miami about it.

"Nobody asked him to endorse Mayor High. Somebody at the press conference asked him about civil rights, and the Congressman said what he did then. How could he endorse Governor Burns when the Governor had said what he did last week.

Mayor High Says Florida Voter Will Reject the 'Spoils System'

FLORIDA 5/21/66

By MARTIN WALDRON

Special to The New York Times

TALLAHASSEE, Fla., May 20—Winding up his second campaign for Governor, Miami Mayor Robert King High said Florida voters next Tuesday would disavow Gov. Haydon Burns "and his spoils system."

Mayor High, a 42-year-old lawyer, is in a run-off with Governor Burns for the Democratic nomination.

While Governor Burns continued to campaign against "the paid Negro bloc vote and outside influences," Mayor High said the real issue was whether Florida voters "are tired of having their state run for the benefit of the Burns campaign machine."

Millions of dollars in state business, he said, have gone to Burns campaign contributors.

"A revolution in conscience and character is going on in Florida," he said this week as he campaigned in the vote-heavy East Coast section of Florida.

Although he has been strongest in south Florida and in the Tampa-St. Petersburg area, Mayor High has found a favorable reception in almost every part of Florida as he has promised to "get rid of the hog-pen morality brought into the Governor's office by Haydon Burns."

'Get Him, Red'

"Go get him, Red," his audiences have shouted.

Mr. High, 5 feet 6 inches tall, has red hair as does his wife, Faith.

For the last two weeks, Mr. High has ignored the Governor's charge that the High campaign has been directed by Senator Robert F. Kennedy of New York. Mr. High said earlier that he had been a friend of President Kennedy, but he denied that Senator Kennedy had taken any part in this campaign.

Governor Burns has said the presence of William F. Haddad and Robert Clampitt, two former Kennedy campaign workers, in the High campaign is proof of the Kennedy influence.

Mr. Haddad, a former reporter, was associate director of the Peace Corps. Mr. Clampitt also was in the Peace Corps.

"The issue in this race is integrity," Mayor High said.

In central and north Florida, Mayor High has taken a back seat to former State Senator Scott Kelly of Lakeland, who was eliminated in the primary of May 3 and subsequently endorsed Mr. High.

Governor Burns had charged that Mr. Kelly sought $500,000 from him in return for his support in a second primary. The Governor later withdrew the charge but Mr. Kelly has continued to attack him on it.

In the first primary, Governor Burns got 35 per cent of the vote, Mayor High, 33 per cent, and Mr. Kelly, 32 per cent.

Backers of Governor Burns have been referring to Mr. Kelly and Mr. High as "Batman and Robin."

Pledges Almost Lost

Almost lost in the campaign have been pledges by Mayor High to clean up air and water pollution in Florida, to raise teachers' salaries, and to tax phosphates and other minerals.

Although he suffered a heart attack about four years ago, Mayor High has kept a whirlwind pace during the campaign. He has traveled as much as 18 hours a day, frequently missing several meals in a row.

He and Mr. Kelly travel in a caravan of small airplanes and helicopters as they speed from town to town.

Guards were placed around their planes last week after a Kelly aide reported he caught someone "tampering" with Mr. Kelly's plane.

Mayor High said the traising of a Negro issue in the campaign was a "desperation move" by Governor Burns.

In 1964, Governor Burns defeated Mayor High easily in a campaign in which the race issue was the only thing discussed. In 1964, Mr. High supported Federal civil rights legislation.

"The race issue won't work again," Mr. High said. "Florida has had excellent racial relations, and the people will not be fooled."

Mayor High was endorsed last Sunday by Representative Adam Clayton Powell, Democrat of Manhattan, an endorsement that Mayor High repudiated as "unwanted."

Mr. Kelly, who said he investigated the "endorsement," charged that Mr. Powell"s trip to Miami and the endorsement had been arranged by a Miami Negro lawyer, Henry Arrington, a supporter of Governor Burns.

As Miami's Mayor, Mr. High had only limited power because the city government is operated by a city manager.

Mr. High used the largely ceremonial position as Mayor to influence public opinion to accept 100,000 Cuban refugees into Miami, and to create a peaceful racial climate.

Universities Ready Change To Quarter System in '67

By CHARLES F. HESSER
Miami News Staff Writer
Special to The Atlanta Journal-Constitution

MIAMI, Fla., May 21 — Florida's state universities will change from the trimester to the quarter system in September 1967.

Dr. J. Broward Culpepper, chancellor of the university system, says there are yet two major factors to be worked out. They are:

Developing the dates for the summer quarter, which is heavily attended by public school teachers.

Arranging budgets for paying faculty members on the basis of the quarter system.

This will be the universities' second major calendar change in five years. They changed from the semester system to the trimester arrangement in the fall of 1962.

Under the new plan, there will be 10 weeks of instruction in each quarter, not including registration or final examinations. All-year operation will consist of 46 weeks of instruction and instruction-related activity.

THE UNIVERSITIES will admit students each quarter, and enough courses will be offered each term "to permit students to progress normally toward a degree, regardless of when they are admitted," Dr. Culpepper said.

He said there will be "optimum faculty involvement" in the calendar changes and in reconsidering the content and arrangement of couress.

Dr. John S. Allen, president of the University of South Florida at Tampa, said the change "gives us an opportunity to review our curricula and course offerings, as we recast them into the quarter plan of operation."

The educator said neither the quarter nor the trimester system works well for public schoolteachers, "who have only two months off duty for summer school attendance."

HE SAID a possible solution would be for departments with offerings that would be of interest to public schoolteachers, to arrange three-week institutes from mid-June to mid-August. Teachers could register for one course in each institute.

Throughout the nation, 24 universities and three branches of the State University of New York operate on the quarter system; 67 and other branches of the New York institution operate on the semester plan.

In 1959, the Florida university presidents began studying the problem of providing higher education to the fast-growing numbers of students who wanted to attend college.

THE PRESIDENTS and the old Board of Control decided the semester system could not meet the needs and that a year-round plan of operation was necessary.

Then the 1961 Legislature became interested in year-round operation. It appropriated additional money to the universities for year-round operation but provided they could not less either the trimester or quarter system went into operation by September 1962.

Dr. Culpepper said that under the trimester system students and faculty felt some pressure because the shorter calendar made it more difficult to cover the academic material. Transfers from high schools and junior colleges also were difficult, he said.

Gov. Burns Upset By High in Florida

FLORIDA

5/25/66 AC

MIAMI, Fla. (AP)—Miami's Mayor Robert King High—making political history in Florida—smashed Tuesday night to an upset victory over Gov. Haydon Burns in the bitter runoff battle for the Democratic gubernatorial nomination.

With 2,510 of Florida's 2,561 precincts in, the mayor had piled up a commanding lead of 570,740 votes to 488,745 for Burns.

The red-haired, 42-year-old High, who campaigned on a promise of "integrity in government," now goes into the general election heavily favored to become the first governor ever elected from the southeast Florida "Gold Coast."

FACES GOP KIRK

He faces Republican Claude R. Kirk Jr., a Jacksonville investment broker, in November. The GOP has gained strength in Florida but the party has not won the governorship in modern times.

Storming back from a lopsided defeat by the 54-year-old Burns in the 1964 runoff, the moderate High overcame the racial issue suddenly resurrected by Burns when the governor found himself in a fight for his political life after the May 3 first primary.

On the eve of the runoff, Burns also had relit the old fires of sectionalism in Florida, charging that if High was elected to work with a legislature now in urban control, Dade County (Miami) would rule the state.

REFUSES TO CONCEDE

At 9:30 p.m. Burns said the returns were inconclusive and he refused to concede.

Burns had clobbered High by 180,000 votes in 1964, calling him "the NAACP candidate" in a battle with strong racial overtones.

In 1966, many thought the racial issue was dead. Burns wooed the Negro vote in the first primary and cut into High's strength there. But the governor revived the issue in the bare-knuckled brawl of the runoff.

In a sampling of predominantly Negro precincts around the state, High piled up leads as high as 8 to 1.

utility and insurance rates, shared credit for his momentus victory with a co-campaigner, Scott Kelly.

Kelly, handsome ex-senator from Lakeland who lost a runoff spot to High by only 6,000 votes in a three-way first primary race, campaigned shoulder-to-shoulder with him in the runoff.

It was in the heavily populated Tampa bay area, "Kelly Country" in the first round, where High reaped the richest crop of new votes.

Through Hillsborough, Pinellas, Sarasota and Manatee counties, High piled up an over-all margin of better than 2 to 1. He added a big haul of votes on the metropolitan lower east coast.

Elsewhere in the state where Burns boasted his greatest strength, High with Kelly's aid cut deeply into the governor's totals.

High, Florida Winner, Faces a Serious G.O.P. Bid

By MARTIN WALDRON
Special to The New York Times

TALLAHASSEE, Fla., May 25—Mayor Robert King High of Miami faced today a serious Republican challenge in November in the Florida governnorship race after defeating Gov. Haydon Burns for the Democratic nomination yesterday.

Florida has not elected a Republican Governor since Ossian B. Hart in 1872, but the party has made substantial gains in the state in recent years.

Claude R. Kirk Jr., the Republican candidate, began "an all-out, 170-day campaign" today.

Democrats did not endorse Mr. High when they nominated him, Mr. Kirk said.

"They just showed who they didn't want," he said.

Mayor High's runoff victory was substantial. A final, unofficial count of the votes showed Mr. High with 585,000 and Governor Burns with 498,000.

A Spilt Develops

A split developed in the Democratic party today when Governor Burns denied a statement by the State Democratic Chairman, Warren Goodrich, that the Governor had agreed to endorse Mayor High.

"I have made no such statement," the Governor said, adding that he had not decided what he would do.

Governor Burns returned to Tallahassee late today. He said he would continue to push his program during the remaining seven months of his term, after which he would enter private businesses.

"I hope to set a pattern and a prestige course from which no one dare veer," the Governor said.

In opening his campaign, Mr. Kirk, a 40-year-old investment banker from Jacksonville, said he expected to spend about $500 000. He called it a "reasonable" amount, which would insure him of victory.

In the three-month Democratic primary, Governor Burns spent about $1.3-million and Mayor High about $300,000.

Florida has 440,000 registered Republicans and 1.9-million registered Democrats, but Republican candidates have traditionally received the votes of many Democrats in the general election.

In the governorship race of 1964, Charles Helley of St. Petersburg, the Republican nominee, got 686,000 votes to 933,000 for Governor Burns.

Senate Bid Fails

Mr. Kirk, a graduate of the University of Alabama Law School, worked in the Presidential campaigns of Dwight D. Eisenhower and Richard M. Nixon as a Democrat. After the Nixon campaign, he became a Republican and lost to Spessard L. Holland in 1964 in a bid for the Senate.

Appearing with Mr. Kirk at a news conference today was the state Republican Chairman, Tom Fairfield Brown, who said the "full resources" of the state Republican party would be made available to Mr. Kirk. Mr. Brown said that only $30,000 was available now but that there were pledges of more money.

Mr. Kirk said his campaign against Senator Holland had made him known to Florida voters "so I can be free to discuss the issues without having to make myself known."

He said:

"I am the only candidate who knows the main streets of Florida when it is not election time. I will tour every main street in the state."

He said he would announce a platform tomorrow.

Mayor High, who is 42, stayed in seclusion today and rested.

His triumph was interpreted as a sign that Florida voters no longer would respond to a racist campaign. Governor Burns had called on Florida's white voters to join with him in defeating "the paid Negro bloc vote."

The Mayor's nomination also raised stock of Senator Robert F. Kennedy. Former aides of the New York Senator worked in the High campaign, and Governor Burns said a vote for Mr. High was a vote for Mr. Kennedy.

RIOT SITE BLOCKED IN POMPANO BEACH

Police in Florida City Fear New Rioting by Negroes

POMPANO BEACH, Fla., June 22 (AP)—Hundreds of Negroes milled in the streets of this city of 16,000 today and the police girded for a possible renewal of rioting.

In the same section where trouble erupted last night, nearly 150 state, county and city policemen wre on patrol. The area was blocked off to all but residents.

Negro leaders moved in the noisy crowd, pleading for peace. One, Harold Cooper, asked teenagers to attend a night meeting at the Calvary Baptist Church.

Last night's outbreak was precipitated by a report that a white man had struck a Negro boy.

Today city officials and civic leaders met in an attempt to ease the situation. Officials left the meeting and begged the unruly crowd to disperse. The reply was angry jeers.

Occasionally, small groups peeled off from the mob, broke windows and ripped boards from the front of a market where the trouble first began last night.

At this store Arthur Marks, the owner, allegedly slapped a 10-year-old Negro boy yesterday. He has been charged with assault and battery.

'It's Started Again'

"It's started again," a police dispatcher said when the crowd returned to the streets.

A group of Negro teen-agers staged a sitdown in the middle aof Hammondville Road, the main street, but broke it up when a patrol car approached.

At 4 P.M. a heavy rain struck the city, and demonstrators sought shelter.

Riot policemen had cleared the streets with billy clubs and a threat of tear gas early today.

Municipal Court was convened at 3:30 A.M. and Judge Harry Fischer placed 23 Negroes under bond on charges of unlawful assembly and disorderly conduct. He released another, a part-time preacher, on his own recognizance.

The police said damage during the night had not been heavy and that there had been no looting. Windows were broken, including all of those in Mr. Marks's store, and Negroes overturned one car and tried to set it afire.

Violence A Surprise

Two policemen were treated for cuts from thrown stones and bottles.

The sudden outbreak came as a surprise in a city where the only racial troubles in the past have been peaceful wade-ins and a few stone throwings. Because of huge vegetable farms in the area. Negro laborers make up a large percentage of the population of Pompano Beach, which is eight miles north of Fort Lauderdale.

About 150 policemen cleared the debris-littered streets shortly after midnight.

The outbreak had begun after the Negro boy complained to his parents about 7 P.M. that he had been slapped in the face by Mr. Marks.

A crowd of Negroes gathered at the store, brandishing sticks and shouting. Policemen escorted Mr. Marks and his wife through the threatening mob and booked Mr. Marks at the jail.

Then two Negroes were arrested on charges of loitering and, as the crowd grew to 600, young Negroes began to throw bottles at passing cars. By midnight a six-block section of Hammondville Road was blocked off by police and highway patrol cars.

The police were ordered to break up the crowd. As they moved in, the Negroes retreated into the shadows and unleashed a shower of rocks and bottles.

Taylor Williams, president of the local chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, said that when he heard of the alleged slapping, he went to the store and begged Mrs. Marks to have her husband apologize "and smooth things over." But no apology was made, he said.

Liquor stores and bars were not allowed to open today.

A 'Beneficial Effect' Is Seen From Tuesday's Rioting

By ALFRED FRIENDLY Jr.
Special to The New York Times

POMPANO BEACH, Fla., June 23—Thundershowers and conversation cooled tempers in this East Coast resort city today, easing the threat of resumed violence of the kind that flared in the Negro section the last two days.

City authorities asked detachments of the Florida Highway Patrol and squads from neighboring towns who helped patrol during the violence to come back for stand-by duty tonight. But the city officials and Negro civic leaders who visited and telephoned them today seemed to agree the danger of violence had temporarily passed.

During the day only three policemen stood guard outside the Russ Supermarket, the target of Tuesday night's brief rioting. The store's windows, broken by the bricks and bottles that Negroes had also hurled at the police, were boarded over again late today with sheets of plywood. At midday yesterday, trouble flared briefly when a small group of Negroes tore away the boards that had been placed over the windows after Tuesday's riot.

'Beneficial Effect'

Across the street today, in front of rows of churning washing machines, Negro women gossiped about their families and friends, seemingly unconcerned by the presence of the police.

Dr. Robert Talmadge Irving, a Negro chiropractor with a small office opposite the grocery on Hammondville Road, choose his words carefully as he said the week's troubles could have "some beneficial effect."

City officials, Dr. Irving said, "will lend a sympathetic ear to our demands; but what they do afterwards is another matter." He said the rioting, which began after the store proprietor, Arthur Marks, allegedly slapped a 10-year-old Negro boy, was not touched off "just by a simple incident."

"At times, things just build to a certain point and then, any little thing can be the straw that broke the camel's back," he maintained.

William H. Johnson, the Negro regional director of the federally financed Community Action Fund, a migrant program, was drawing up a list of grievances today.

"This was out and out rebellion, primarily against the store owner, secondarily against the attitude of the police," he said. "This again points up the fact that things were not as well as the people across the tracks like to think." The tracks of the Seaboard Airline Railroad Company split the northwest section of town and its six or seven thousand Negro inhabitants from the estimated total of 21,000 permanent white residents who live on palm tree shaded streets nearer the ocean.

The gulf between the two communities, however, appears wider than any physical divider formed by the rails. "This is no peaceful little Negro community, despite what anybody thinks," Mr. Johnson said. "We're going around with chips on our shoulders."

Capt. Max Coleman, who is second in command of the 40-man police force that has only two Negroes, echoed a common white sentiment when he said that "frankly this whole thing is surprising to us — our relations, we thought, were always good here."

City Manager Ellsworth Hoppe, pointing to five recently paved streets in the negro sections, said there was "ten times" as much sidewalk in the Negro areas as in the rest of the city.

Tax Equality Crackdown Brings Cries of Anguish

MIAMI, Fla., July 16 — Florida Comptroller Fred O. Dickinson, following a State Supreme Court directive, is cracking down on county tax assessors.

"The Supreme Court has spoken," said Dickinson. "We must move forward this year to accomplish the 100 per cent just valuation of property tax assessment rolls."

FLORIDA

Dickinson gave the state's 67 county tax assessors until Sept. 15 to complete their reassessments. He appointed a field task force of five special assistants to aid the assessors.

The comptroller called all the tax assessors to Tallahassee to lay down the law.

Following a meeting of the assessors with Dickinson's special assistants, reports were the county officials would cooperate, but some did not like the crash program. Some felt Dickinson's directive forced them into a hodge-podge job.

IN ITS order to Dickinson, the State Supreme Court noted that less than a dozen Florida counties had completed reassessment the high tribunal ordered months ago to bring property values up to the 100 per cent level. In some counties assessment is at less than 50 per cent, with Flagler low at 17.54.

The court said that assessment "should be fixed by applying the classic formula for establishing fair market value, namely, the amount a purchaser under no stress to buy a given piece of property would pay a nonnecessitious (one without need) seller."

STUDIES BY Dickinson's office show that about half of the 67 counties either are at 100 per cent valuation or have professional reassessment appraisers at work.

In the other counties, said Dickinson, reassessment has been done by the assessors or no reassessment has been done at all.

Dickinson's division on tax assessment has compiled "adjustment ratios" for each county based on study of county tax records over a five-year period. The present assessment level will have to be multiplied by the adjustment ratio to get 100 per cent.

Hamilton County, for instance, now assessing at a little over 50 per cent, would multiply its present assessments by 1.986 to bring its rolls up to 100 per cent.

But, long-time observers of the Florida political scene are certain that Dickinson's deadline on reassessment will mean that the 1967 legislature will provide some relief for homeowners.

Miami's 'Season' Is Complete Bust

MIAMI, Fla., Aug. 20—It will take the Greater Miami area longer than overnight to get back to a normal economic level when the struck airlines are flying again.

Amos Martin, executive director of the Miami - Dade Chamber of Commerce, estimated it would take from several weeks to a month to return "to business as usual" on tourists and conventions.

Chamber officials placed the cost of the strike at about $80 million, including airline salaries, airline purchases and tourist spending that didn't take place.

Herbert Robbins, president

FLORIDA

of the South Florida Hotel and Motel Association, said the summer season, which was expected to set a record, "is a bust."

"It's a complete wipeout, nothing can be salvaged now," said Robbins. "All we can do now is work to restore the pattern of reservations and hope they begin coming in on time (for the winter season) by mid-October."

THE STRIKE occasioned some strange happenings.

A New York tourist, for instance, flew into a rage at Miami International Airport when he learned that one of the operatnig airlines had cancelled reservations for himself, his wife and three children because he had made his reservations only 23 hours ahead of time instead of 24.

He threatened fisticuffs and gave his wife bail money before the airline suddenly discovered five "no shows" just before take-off and let the tourist and his family board the plane.

The Florida Development Commission paid $2,615 for a full-page advertisement in a Washington newspaper, signed by Gov. Haydon Burns, thanking President Johnson for "settling" the strike. The ad, however, turned out to be premature. The strikers rejected the "settlement."

And in a mass action against Eastern Airlines, 64 striking machinists filed to collect workmen's compensation. They suddenly decided their hearing had been impaired by roaring jet engines.

THE PICTURE on Miami Beach has been one of empty hotel rooms, of hundreds of waitresses, bellboys, chamber maids and cabana boys out of work, of merchants on the Beach's world famous Lincoln Road Mall, standing in front of their stores wringing their hands and awaiting customers who never came.

State Sweepstakes Proposal Picking Up Strong Support

By CHARLES F. HESSER

FLORIDA

MIAMI, Fla., Sept. 3—Support for a state sweepstakes in Florida appears to be growing. The state already has legalized horse, dog and trotting racing and jai-alai.

Several influential Florida newspapers have come out for a state lottery; a member of the State Racing Commission is boosting a sweepstakes; and an influential committee of legislators and laymen is studying this new means of gambling revenue.

The Lakeland Ledger says, in effect, if it is proper for the well-to-do to bet on racing and jai-alai, it would be all right for a working man to buy a sweepstakes ticket. The Orlando Sentinel saying about the same, suggested that the people of Florida be allowed to vote on whether they want a lottery.

LOUIE BANDEL, of Miami, a member of the State Racing Commission and its former chairman, estimates a sweepstakes would produce up to $50 million a year in gambling taxes.

"If New Hampshire can tolerate a sweepstakes, then Florida should welcome one," Bandel observed.

The State Tax Reform Commission, the group of legislators and laymen, charged with revamping Florida tax laws, is studying New Hampshire's sweepstakes which is funneling more than $2.5 million annually into that state's school fund.

THIS WOULD be peanuts where school wants in Florida are concerned — it is estimated the education system will need more than $100 million annually in new money come 1967—but Bandel's $50 million figure might prove tempting.

During fiscal 1964-65, racing and jai-alai produced only $35.9 million in taxes.

A proposed sweepstakes bill is already being circulated in Florida. The sweepstakes would be controlled by a three-member commission. Two sweepstakes races a year would be held at a Florida race track. Tickets would be available at the race tracks as well as at automobile tag agencies.

Tax returns would be allocated to each county on the basis of a flat grant per resident student.

But, as attractive as a sweepstakes may be—it is being described by backers as a "painless" way to raise new money—it is certain to run into heated opposition. Florida Methodist circles are already warning of a "powerful" move to legalize a lottery.

SOME INTERESTS think Florida already has too much gambling.

Legalized gambling in Florida goes back to 1931, when the legislature of that year, hard-pressed for funds, legalized pari-mutuel gambling, overriding the veto of then Gov. Doyle Carlton Sr.

Carlton observed at that time, "It is unsound and unwise from an economic, political or moral standpoint to commit the state to a partnership in legalized gambling in any form. If we start with pari-mutuels, where shall we stop?"

And Florida didn't stop with horse racing. Added as the years went by were dog and harness racing, and jai-alai. The state in 1935, still in the throes of an economic depression, legalized slot machines. But, by 1937, the state had enough of the "one - armed bandits," and repealed the law which had authorized their operation.

Gambling legislation has tied up many a Florida Legislature and resulted in a scandal in the 1949 session.

What Is the Cost Of Big Campaign?

9/11/66

By JOE HATCHER

Staff Writer, The Nashville Tennessean

NASHVILLE, Tenn., Sept. 10—The cost of running for high office in Tennessee has grown to astronomical proportions, but the candidates go right ahead swearing that they expend less than the $25,000 limit set by law, a Ford Foundation survey of the state reveals.

A minimum of $150,000 would be required to run a U.S. Senate campaign, but several times that amount is expended from time to time the report shows.

The issue of truthful reporting of campaign expenses arose in the August primaries, but candidate John J. Hooker, Jr. lost despite his pledge to "tell the truth."

The Ford survey, based in 1948-1964 campaigns, bore out the Hooker charges of high spending.

Hooker filed his campaign

TENNESSEE

expense report almost simultaneously with the survey. He listed his losing cause as costing $591,297.27. Winner Buford Ellington filed a sworn statement of $24,809.12. It is generally conceded that the Ellington campaign cost far in excess of the Hooker campaign. Most estimates place the Ellington figure at near $1 million.

ELLINGTON agreed, during the controversy, that the figures filed were unrealistic, but said only the expenses known to him personally were included.

Gov. Frank Clement listed his expenses for the Senate at $24,089.98. Sen. Ross Bass listed also less than the $25,000 limit.

The Ford survey, made by William Buchanan of Washington and Lee University, and Mrs. Agnes Bird of the University of Tennessee, found no major campaigns under $75,000 since 1948 and most averaging $200,000.

Sen. Estes Kefauver spent $325,000 in 1960 to beat Judge A. T. Taylor who spent $200,000. Kefauver was the only big spender to win in the period studied.

HOOKER'S REPORT gives the first realistic accounting of what a campaign actually cost.

He listed office expenses at $103,500, advertising at $305,400, travel at $62,841 and printing and literature $119,516.61.

Whether the legislature will do anything about making the costs realistic and enforcing limitations is an issue that will likely come before the 1967 legislature.

The Ford Foundation report advances the idea that most of the money spent is wasted, and does not actually influence the elections, as evidenced by lower cost campaigns often getting the big percentage of votes. The candidate's personality, appeal to the voters, and support from forces seeking to or receiving favors, provide more powerful influences over the voters.

COLLINS TO SEEK SMATHERS'S SEAT

Ex-Governor Plans to Run for Senate in Florida in '68

9/16/66

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 — LeRoy Collins plans to run in 1968 for the Senate seat now held by George A. Smathers.

Mr. Smathers, a Democrat, announced earlier this year that he would retire at the end of his present term because of ill health.

President Johnson announced yesterday that he had "reluctantly agreed" to accept Mr. Collins's resignation as Under Secretary of Commerce, effective Oct. 1.

Mr. Collins, former Democratic Governor of Florida, will join the Tampa law firm of Fowler, White, Gillen, Humkey and Treman. In addition to practicing law, he will spend the next two years laying the groundwork for his Senate campaign.

Representative Claude D. Pepper, Democrat of Miami, said today that he was also considering seeking Mr. Smather's Senate post.

"That's the seat I held for 14 years," Mr. Pepper said. "I have been encouraged all over the state to run again I'm exploring the matter."

The 66-year-old representative made two unsuccessful races to return to the Senate —one in 1950, the other in 1958. He was first elected to it in 1936.

Mr. Collins, who is 55, has said on several occasions that he would be a candidate for the Senate. He served as Governor from 1955 to 1960 and was subsequently president of the National Association of Broadcasters.

Two years ago, the President appointed him the first director of Community Relations Service, an agency established under the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to conciliate racial disputes. After serving in that post for a year, Mr. Collins was appointed Under Secretary of Commerce, the No. 2 post in the Commerce Department.

Mr. Johnson said in a letter accepting the resignation that "you have my very good wish in the private practice of law, and you have earned the right to return to your home state."

The President said he was "particularly mindful of the skillful job you did for your country" in Selma, Ala., in 1965. Mr. Collins had gone there during a crisis between civil rights workers and Alabama law enforcement authorities and had helped to work out an agreement that resulted in restoring peace to the community.

THE

VICTOR IN FLORIDA VOWS CRIME FIGHT

Kirk, New G.O.P. Governor, Says He Will Start Now

By MARTIN WALDRON

Special to The New York Times

TALLAHASSEE, Fla., Nov. 9 —Claude R. Kirk Jr., the 40-year-old Republican who confounded Florida political experts by being elected Governor yesterday, said today he would begin to clean up crime in Miami without waiting to take office in January.

Mr. Kirk, who won over favored Miami Mayor Robert King High the Democratic nominee, said he would personally direct the clean-up.

During the gubernatorial race, Mr. Kirk referred to Miami — the favorite vacation spot of several million tourists each year — as a "cesspool of crime." A grand jury reported in Miami yesterday that police officials had made no effort to clean up a situation that included organized rackets.

Mr. Kirk did not explain what steps he would take in his anti-crime fight in South Florida.

The Republican rode into office on a wave of white backlash and sentiment against the Great Society in Florida and sent Mayor High, a racial liberal, to a smashing defeat. With more than 95 per cent of the vote counted, Mr. Kirk had 795,000 votes, Mayor High 645,000.

First Victory Since 1872

He is the first Republican to be elected Governor of Florida since 1872.

Gov. Haydon Burns, a Democrat, acknowledged today that he had supported Mr. Kirk during the campaign.

The Governor, defeated in last May's Democratic primary by Mr. High, said "my friends throughout the state took an active part in Mr. Kirk's campaign."

"I am pleased that he will be the new Governor," he added.

There has been bad feeling between Governor Burns and Mayor High, who cast doubt on the honesty of the Burns administration, Mr. Burns said he considered the Republican victory a "vindication."

Mr. Kirk, a former investment banker and insurance executive, said today that he foresaw no difficulty in working with Demcrats who dominate other state offices and the Florida Legislature.

The strong race run by Mr. Kirk greatly increased the number of Republican state legislators in Florida. The number of Republican State Senators was increased from two to 11 and the number of Republican House members from seven to 24. This will mean that Republicans will have about 20 per cent of the seats in the Legislature.

Sees Kennedy Defeat

Governor Burns said the defeat of Mr. High was a defeat for Senator Robert F. Kennedy, Democrat of New York. Kennedy forces helped Mr. High in the May primaries, but were not on hand during the general election campaign.

Governor Burns said the Kirk victory demonstrated that Florida voters would not accept "giveaway programs, riots in the streets and civil disobedience."

Mr. Kirk appealed for the City Awaits N.A.A.C.P. Reply To Its Progress Report

JACKSONVILLE, Fla., July 22 (UPI)—A meeting that could hold the key to Jacksonville's racial peace ended today with Negro leaders giving no indication whether they were content with the city's integration progress report.

Negroes had submitted a list of eight demands and said they expected action on at least two of them.

Otherwise, they threatened to resume massive street demonstrations. Such a protest triggered three nights of fire-bombings and disorders earlier in the week.

"We've had both good and bad experiences with the meetings with the mayor and commissioners," said Rutledge Pearson, state president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Statement Planned

A statement is to be issued tomorrow morning by the N.A.A.C.P. executive committee on whether the Negroes were satisfied with the city's progress report.

Mayor Louis Ritter told Mr. Pearson that action would be taken on each of the eight demands, including complete integration of the police force, slum clearance and training of neighborhood Youth Corp personnel in City Hall.

The Mayor urged the Negro leaders to use their influence in preventing further racial unrest in a Negro district during the weekend.

Mayor Ritter said white segregationists who identified themselves as members of the Ku Klux Klan had sent telegrams to City Hall advising officials they had planned to come to Jacksonville.

"We don't want these people and these people won't come in here as long as I'm chief," Mayor Ritter said.

Cooperation Urged

The Mayor urged the Negro leaders to work with Negro youths believed responsible for the earlier violence.

Mr. Ritter said a program would be implemented in the field of recreation immediately, to provide an outlet for tensions built up among the Negro teenagers.

The mayor said it had been decided to utilize Federal funds in building two swimming pools instead of reopening the two demanded by the Negroes.

He said insufficient funds to install filters at the outdated pools made it more feasible to use Federal money to build new facilities at different locations, both of which were to be fully integrated.

He also assured the Negroes that members of their race would be upgraded immediately in five departments under City Hall jurisdiction.

Hurricane Season Starts; 'Seeding' Planes Ready

By CHARLES F. HESSER

FLORIDA

MIAMI, Fla., June 4—The "hurricane season" started last Wednesday, but weather observers point out this isn't as alarming as it sounds. The season, which runs through November, is selected for the convenience of the weather bureau as a time when its warning service is in operation.

Years can go by without a hurricane showing up during the "hurricane season." But, Atlantic hurricanes have occurred every month except April.

Weather bureau research planes which had been used on other projects returned to Miami Wednesday. The bureau maintains two DC-6s, a C-54 and a high altitude jet WB-57, and is assisted in its research on hurricanes by other weather phenomena and by planes from the Air Force and Navy.

EXPERIMENTS with seeding hurricanes will be continued this year if a suitable storm comes along. The proper hurricane for such an experiment must be one which does not threaten an inhabited place but is close enough to an airbase to permit planes to spend considerable time in it and return with a safe margin of fuel.

No seeding was attempted last season because no hurricane fit Miami Weather Bureau specifications.

Planes used for the experiments are fitted with a device which burns silver iodide and releases the particles into clouds around the storm center. The idea is to change the pattern of the hurricane, which could cause a change in course.

Along with moving its planes here, the weather bureau put into operation its teletype network for the rapid distribution of information on storms. The network extends from Brownsville, Tex., along the coast to North Carolina.

PROBABILITY of a tropical storm appearing somewhere in the Atlantic "hurricane belt" is worked out by the weather bureau on a percentage basis — for instance, June 34 per cent, July 39, August 75, September 92, October 83 and November 36.

Better and quicker information will help forecasters and the public this season.

New this year are direct readings from two satellites, instead of a relay system used last year, and twice-a-day outlooks instead of one will be distributed to all news media at 6 a.m. and at 11:45 a.m.

THERE WERE six tropical storms last year, four of them reaching hurricane force. This was the smallest number since 1962. The average is 10 storms a year.

Of last year's four, only Betsy did any land damage. Anna, Carol and Elena chose ocean paths to oblivion.

But Betsy will be long remembered. She did more property damage than any storm in the nation's hurricane history as she raked South Florida and plastered New Orleans.

Betsy, pushing flood tides ahead of her did $1.4 billion in damage mostly in the New Orleans area. The buxom storm cost South Florida $140 million in damages.

FOUNDATIONS

THE AMERICAN WAY OF GIVING

A few years ago some officers of the Ford Foundation were discussing various ways Ford's millions could generate social reform. As the brainstormers saw it, the existing power structure of business, labor and government was too firmly entrenched to make really significant changes. Finally one officer offered a simple suggestion: "Let's just buy Rhode Island" and make a fresh start.

Though Rhode Island wasn't for sale, the Ford Foundation, which this year will spend at least $250 million around the world, would have had little trouble paying operating costs for the state. Gov. John H. Chafee plans to get by on $188 million in 1966. And the notion of such ambition by U.S. foundations is not as farfetched as it may sound. Each year Ford and the nation's 15,000 other foundations dispense some $1.1 billion through a system of organized private giving for public purposes so potent that some social historians have called it the Fifth Estate. Indeed, the dollars they have poured out have exerted a strong influence in shaping the quality of twentieth-century life.

Foundation money helped eradicate hookworm, yellow fever and malaria in many areas of the world (the Rockefeller Foundation); built 2,509 libraries in the U.S. and other English-speaking countries (Carnegie Corp.); supported Robert H. Goddard's rocket research when the military could not see a need for it (Smithsonian Institution and the Daniel and Florence Guggenheim Foundation); modernized Mexican agriculture (Rockefeller) and sustained U.S. educational television (Ford); developed the new math for U.S. schools (Carnegie), brought new contraceptive techniques to villages in India (Ford and Rockefeller) and supported almost 7,000 artists and scholars (John Simon Guggenheim). Even such everyday items as Pyrex glass and the outer white lines on highways are the result of efforts by the Carnegie Institution of Washington and the Dorr Foundation.

Warpath: Despite these successes, foundations have often had to fight to protect their sovereign status. Congressional committees, which once suspected that foundations were nothing more than shrewd schemes for holding on to great fortunes, later worried that they were serving international Communism. Today certain foundations are under attack from liberals who decry the right-wing pamphleteering that masks itself as educational activity. Some critics claim that large foundations are a benevolent-aid society for the Eastern Establishment: Dean Rusk went from the State Department to Rockefeller to State, John W. Gardner from Carnegie to HEW and last week McGeorge Bundy went from the White House to Ford. And the occasional abuses of the tax-exempt status of foundations for private gain has Wright Patman of Texas on the warpath again.

"We still suffer from the old John D. Rockefeller kerosene trust," the 72-year-old congressman said last week. "Foundations are perpetuating themselves in office. It's like feudal Europe." He proposes limiting the lives of foundations to 25 years, a remedy already rejected by the Treasury Department. But in a 1965 report on foundation tax exemption, the department recommended tighter restrictions on foundation finances, including a law barring them from owning more than 20 per cent of a business.

Slow Beat: Significantly, philanthropoids themselves are re-examining the foundations. "Philanthropy generally is not attuned to the tempo of the times," John D. Rockefeller III said recently. "We are prone to be too complacent." One reason for the discontent is the fact that foundations no longer enjoy a benevolent monopoly.

The Ford Foundation was once described as "a large body of money surrounded by a lot of people who want some." Foundations in the Great Society are large bodies of money surrounded by even more money—that of the Federal government. In nearly all the traditional foundation fields—education, health, international aid and research—the government is now spending more than the private foundations. And, significantly, much of the money is going for research and development of new ideas.

Turnabout: The government's National Foundation on the Arts and the Humanities promises to be one particularly adventurous agency and may even reverse traditional roles. Arts council chairman, Roger Stevens, has authority to finance pilot projects and then ask private foundations to put up matching funds or take over the projects. While foundations claim that they are the venture capital in a pluralistic economy, examples like this have prompted critics to say that government has captured the lead in innovation as well. Foundations, in short, are being forced to search for new purposes for their billions.

One critic on record that the Federal government often makes better grants than private foundations is the Ford's new president, 46-year-old McGeorge Bundy, who once sought grants when he was a Harvard dean. "Bundy arrives," says a top Ford officer, "when a congruence of forces both within and outside the foundation make it a critical time to have a younger man in charge of the foundation's fortune."

'Just a minute, young man. That's not quite the way we do things here at the Ford Foundation'

"When McGeorge Bundy was announced," cracked one staffer, "a lot of people ran to the windows to jump." But so far Bundy, who can be ruthlessly efficient when he must, has been rather genial. At a meeting with the foundation's officers on his first day in office last week he managed, says one impressed staffer, "to give everybody the idea we were going places. I've seen people take over organizations before, but never with a tour de force like this." Then Bundy made a tour of the cramped Ford offices on New York's Madison Avenue (the foundation will move to new twelve-story headquarters near the United Nations Building next March), introducing himself to everyone including secretaries.

Nevertheless, some of the jumpiness among the 147-man professional staff is justified. Bundy probably will trim Ford's administrative pyramid to achieve greater flexibility. One prospective appointment: the State Department's David Bell may come in July to be international vice president.

Lollipops: Foundations can be called trusts, funds, societies or endowments, and they can support anything the IRS will allow as charitable, social, religious or educational. The purpose can be as lofty as Rockefeller's ("to promote the well-being of mankind throughout the world") or as circumscribed as that of The Lollipop Foundation of America which distributes 300,000 all-day suckers each year to hospitalized children. The Benefit Shoe Foundation offers persons with one foot single shoes, the Mount Everest Foundation will assist U.S. mountain climbers, two foundations stand ready to help preserve the prairie chicken and the Headache Research Foundation has an obvious mission. And "until the end of the world," schoolchildren in Scotch Plains and Fanwood, N.J., are promised a scoop of ice cream a year by the Dr. Coles Trust Fund.

The most influential contributions, however, have not been made by such scattered hands. By near unanimous opinion three foundations stand out above all. "It would be awfully hard to find any money in the U.S.," claims University of California president Clark Kerr, "as well spent as that spent by Ford, Carnegie and Rockefeller."

Andrew Carnegie preached a gospel of wealth to his fellow millionaires which held that their "surplus wealth" should be treated as a "public trust." Before income tax was a problem, the immigrant Scot argued that wealthy people had an obligation to help those who had the talent and will to follow.

For his part, John D. Rockefeller felt a religious obligation to give, but he, Carnegie and other industrial captains soon found their wealth outstripped their capacity to disperse it. Concerned that their philanthropy be capricious, they seized on the foundation as a way to spend money as efficiently as their corporations made it. Carnegie, after establishing numerous specialized funds, founded the first general-research foundation, the Carnegie Corporation, with $25 million in 1911. The Rockefeller Foundation was incorporated in 1913 with $35 million, later received $148 million more from its founder.

Exodus: Ford, the third member of the Big Three in foundations, was a product of post-World War II taxes. "The man who dies rich," Carnegie had argued, "dies disgraced." The IRS also made sure the rich couldn't leave very much anyway, causing a mass exodus of wealth into foundation havens. For Henry and Edsel Ford, the foundation device offered a convenient way "to advance human welfare" and at the same time keep the Ford company in the family—it would have had to sell most of the stock to pay estate taxes when they died. The foundation inherited 88 per cent of the Fords' stock (non-voting), creating what may remain the world's largest foundation.

The major foundations, and the best of the smaller funds, still "advance human welfare," but selectively. Foundations account for only 8 per cent of private giving, but their influence has come from their ability to use money to get at the causes of problems and encourage more money to follow. "Big foundations like Ford, Rockefeller and Carnegie," says John W. Gardner, Secretary of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare on leave from the presidency of Carnegie Corporation, "have an extraordinary opportunity to look beyond crises of the day, dig deeper and arrive at independent judgments they can make available to the people."

If the ends of philanthropy remain basically the same, the means have changed considerably from the days when a John D. Rockefeller could hear about the evils of hookworm and decide to eradicate it. Now, the money is dispensed by philanthropoids (a term coined by former Carnegie Corporation president Frederick P. Keppel). In major foundations, these men are polished specialists operating under defined programs. Typically, the philanthropoid is an ex-academic or government bureaucrat who travels widely looking for new ideas and talent.

Money Men: "The philanthropoid is not particularly imaginative," says one former foundation man who has returned to teaching. "He might have become a dean or vice provost—he's happier in administration." But many are extraordinarily able men drawn by the foundations' power to effect change, and Harvard's David Riesman claims that "some of the most reflective men I know are in foundations."

A problem for philanthropoids is the awe and obeisance of some of the people they deal with. James W. Armsey, who administers Ford's lucrative ($277 million thus far) matching-grant program for colleges, ruefully notes that "every phrase I write is scrutinized and dissected for meaning." So strong is Armsey's word that one college president admits "there are a lot of us who would run down Fifth Avenue naked if Jim Armsey said it would help get one of his grants." Peter Caws, a former officer at Carnegie, observed that "wherever you go you are welcome, every suggestion you make is regarded as a special kind of illumination from above. When I went to Carnegie, a friend told me, 'You'll never have another honest conversation again in your life'."

Bishoprics: Hovering around the major foundations are a variety of specialists, usually in the academic world, who consult or informally advise the philanthropoid. "Each foundation has its bishopric," explains one of Ford's academic bishops. "If you look at the professors on the senior level of any university you can distinguish to what bishopric each belongs." Serving the foundations this way can be lucrative in more ways than prestige and access to grant money. Foundation executives, says Carnegie acting president Alan Pifer, frequently make recommendations for college presidents and deans, and they tend to nominate those they know.

Each foundation has a distinct style. Although it is one of the youngest large foundations, Ford is already one of the most highly bureaucratized. Graced with a larger endowment than ever before imagined in philanthropy, Ford has struggled to find a sensible way to manage its fortune. But while critics fault Ford for being "bureaucratized," Ford has managed to move effectively. Last year, for example, it allocated $85 million for orchestras, and it has created "satellite" organizations such as Educational Facilities Laboratories, which tests ideas in school construction.

In the early years when Paul Hoffman and Robert M. Hutchins ran the foundation, Ford was a whirling picture of innovation, liberalism and occasionally zany grants. "Every now and then the newspapers would pick up some wild grant," recalls a staffer at the time, "and Henry [Ford II] would come in and roar 'Jesus Christ, why can't we be a nice foundation like Rockefeller?' "

Eventually the trustees found a man more to their tastes, Henry T. Heald, who, with a background in engineering, had proven himself an able administrator at Illinois Institute of Technology and New York University. Under Heald, Ford gained coherency, pioneered in the U.S. and abroad in poverty, education and birth control, but, say some, failed to use all its resources imaginatively.

The Way Up: Ford grants usually carry a long internal history (page 90). Every grant must work its way through a "discussion paper" prepared for the staff officers in a particular program, such as education. The next step takes it to all the officers and, finally, through the president to the trustees. Trustee approval of programs or projects is far from automatic. The trustees are bankers like Eugene R. Black, publishers like John Cowles and academic administrators like new chairman Julius A. Stratton. "Given this world," says one Ford staffer, "they are liberal men among conservatives." "In presenting proposals," he adds, "we don't make a grant seem like a breaking-down-the-barricades proposition."

To skeptics, the system hasn't worked very well. "It's a contradiction in terms," scoffs Hutchins, "to say a mammoth organization is going to be adventurous. Picture the Ford board at a meeting —it's almost a drain on the intelligence just to imagine all those weighty responsibilities they have taken on in so many places." And to insiders, the foundation has not always been a happy place in recent years. Even some admirers of Heald felt his stewardship had grown heavy-handed. Heald, who maintained that a foundation should be a "cutting edge," indirectly answered charges that the foundation hadn't been cutting enough by noting in his last annual report that "a vast amount of social change consists of skillful, painstaking introduction and perfection of ideas already articulated—processes that do not attract brilliant spotlights." And despite the fact that the foundation has sold a large part of its Ford stock, Heald says that "people at the Ford Motor Co. were at times just as unhappy as they could be over some of our actions."

Talent Scouts: Before the rise of the Ford superfoundation, the biggest spender was the Rockefeller Foundation. An early supporter of basic research, the foundation has had enviable success in picking talent: about one-third of the winners of Nobel Prizes for science or medicine received, some time before the award, Rockefeller money for their research. Fittingly, the foundation commands a 42-story-high view of New York, but in organization it resembles a graduate school. For a long time the staff was divided into various academic disciplines, and recently the foundation reorganized into inter-disciplinary areas, just as the most up-to-date campuses have. Even the board of trustees has a strong academic orientation—nine of its nineteen members hold positions in colleges or universities.

With at least half of its $33 million annual budget going to overseas projects, Rockefeller has often led the way for U.S. Government foreign aid. A significant example of the foundation's ability to move years before the government was Rockefeller's project in Mexico, which increased corn, wheat and bean production threefold in twenty years. But when Washington is willing, Rockefeller president J. George Harrar says he is eager "to collaborate with the [U.S.] government."

Rockefeller is also willing to join with other foundations. The International Rice Research Institute in the Philippines, which may revolutionize agriculture in the Far East, is staffed by Rockefeller, but the $7.5 million starting cost was paid by Ford.

The Carnegie Corporation, which has an annual budget of $12 million, takes pride in its unbureaucratic ways. It makes a point of congeniality and invention. The doors at its Fifth Avenue offices are open to grant-seekers. "Carnegie," says corporation secretary Florence Anderson, "likes to be a cutting edge for other foundations. We're smaller, so we have to be brighter."

Under the leadership of John Gardner, whose influence far exceeded the grants he approved, Carnegie was among the most imaginative of foundations. Shortly after World War II, Carnegie funded the Russian Research Center at Harvard, setting an example for area-study centers at universities. Other foundations, notably Ford and Rockefeller, have since put their greater resources behind the idea. Carnegie began supporting new mathematics curriculums a year before Sputnik I and paid for James Bryant Conant's influential studies of American schools.

The foundation's flexibility has allowed it to react more quickly to small, individual requests for funds than some of the larger foundations. John Kenneth Galbraith reports he had little trouble persuading Carnegie in 1950 to give him a modest grant to allow him time for developing one of the first courses on the economics of developing countries.

Full Harvest: Traditionally, universities and colleges have been a favorite planting ground for foundation money. Rockefeller's General Education Board spent $95 million to help make American medical schools among the best in the world. Carnegie pioneered in establishing music and art as part of the college curriculum. Ford granted $260 million to raise teachers' salaries across the nation and sponsors the National Merit Scholarship Corporation, which gives scholarships to top high-school graduates. It also pioneered in teacher education. Danforth and Wilson fellowships have encouraged some of the best students to continue on in graduate school to become college teachers. And individual foundation programs in various disciplines have prodded universities into new areas of study and, in many ways, prepared the ground for the multiversity built with Federal funds.

But foundation dollars can be a mixed blessing. Foundations, reports Wisconsin historian Merle Curti, have made universities become "places where talented scholars hang their hats while pursuing the answers to problems of advanced research." These "executive professors" with foundation connections can fly around the world on consulting or research missions almost at will. "The amount of money you can get for research," says Columbia's Paul F. Lazarsfeld, "is practically infinite." Projectitis, the disease of obsessive group research, is growing. Economist Galbraith, who is a trustee of the Twentieth Century Fund, is "struck with how scarce good projects are," particularly since the fund gets so many requests from "people who want to be great entrepreneurs of research, sitting on top of a project pyramid. The failure rate," he reports, "is pretty high." An important side effect of projectitis, of course, is that teaching is downgraded and Berkeley fever begins to spread among students.

Name Game: Nonetheless, grantsmanship remains among the most popular of academic activities. Like speaking a foreign language, grant-seeking is easy and enjoyable for those who know how, but rather difficult for the uninitiated. A lot depends on whom you know.

A grant, says master fund-raiser Richard F. O'Brien, who lured $113 million to Stanford before taking over the University of Chicago's $160 million drive, often begins informally. "A faculty member has an idea, and when he's in New York he drops in at a foundation where there are people he knows. If they think the idea sounds good, the faculty member comes back and draws up a formal proposal." For a neophyte who thinks in modest terms, O'Brien stands ready to "help him shape the proposals, making sure, for example, he has anticipated all costs, reminding him that he can get aid for assistants and equipment."

"What it boils down to in the end," says David C. McClelland, professor of psychology at Harvard, "is that if someone on the inside has confidence in you, you get the grant. Once you get above a certain level of visibility, the opportunities are fantastic."

Though most major universities and colleges keep a constant check on foundation interests and such friendly contacts as alumni on boards of trustees, when a school embarks on a major hunt for capital, foundation-watching and wooing becomes a major administration preoccupation. At the University of Southern California, where a twenty-year master-plan drive for $106.7 million may be achieved this spring, only five

STOREFRONT LAW: ANATOMY OF A GRANT

Mrs. Aubrey Potts, 31, of New Haven, Conn., was having her troubles. Her rent was unpaid and her landlord ordered eviction when he suspected that one of her five children had set a fire in the apartment building. She lost her driver's license after an accident, and she wanted to divorce her husband, claiming desertion. On a nurse's aide's salary of $62 a week, Mrs. Potts could hardly afford the cost of a lawyer to straighten out the mess. But following a friend's advice, Mrs. Potts found one lawyer, who helped her recover her apartment and is trying to recover her license. Another is handling the divorce. This battery of legal talent has cost her nothing. In effect, the Ford Foundation paid the bills by way of a sizable grant to the Legal Assistance Association, Inc., (LAA) of New Haven, a group of lawyers who have established storefront law offices in poor neighborhoods.

The dollars that helped Mrs. Potts were part of a much larger effort to remedy a serious defect in the administration of U.S. justice. Though the poor are more apt to get arrested, they often have no adequate counsel; though they often suffer from the depredations of loan sharks, slumlords and finance companies, they have the least access to legal advice.

Step One: Few of the legal applications submitted to the Ford Foundation were concerned with this widespread and depressing situation when William Pincus joined the foundation's public-affairs program in 1957. Most grant proposals came from law schools, and the academic mind tended to look down on the problems of criminal law as being intellectually uninteresting. And the foundation itself, Pincus recalls, "had a tendency to take for granted that research and education were good. Rarely was the test from a social point of view—how to give more benefits to more people." So Pincus, a former government lawyer with the born reformer's drive to help the underdog, began a campaign to convince both the legal profession and the foundation of the need for change. In 1959, the first step toward a broader effort was taken with an $800,000 Ford grant to the National Legal Aid and Defender Association —an organization that encourages legal assistance to persons unable to afford a lawyer. Ford asked NLADA to set up clinics to interest law students in the problems of the poor.

Working closely with NLADA, Ford then developed the National Defender Project to provide more direct legal assistance. By constitutional right, defendants are entitled to representation in a criminal case; but in many states, the poor and the powerless were being denied their rights. Just three months after the Ford trustees approved the $2.3 million Defender Project appropriation, the Supreme Court extended this constitutional right to the states in the Gideon v. Wainwright decision.

The money allowed NLADA to devise several experiments to demonstrate what an adequate defense ought to be like; it also channeled money into existing legal programs. In New Haven, paid lawyers set up shop first in two community schools, later in storefront law offices. In Philadelphia, a "circuit-riding" lawyer visited jails and investigated prisoner complaints of unfair trials (15 per cent had a case valid enough for the lawyer to help them file writs of habeas corpus). In Boston, a team of lawyers and students represented the poor in misdemeanor cases, and in Houston a NLADA project may lead to a state law requiring every lawyer to take on some impoverished clients.

Full Defense: Many of these cities were given priority for the Defender Project money because they were part of Ford's "gray areas" program, another imaginative foundation venture with profound social implications (it later became the prototype for the Federal poverty war).

In New Haven, for example, Ford workers and city officials developed a comprehensive anti-poverty program which included neighborhood centers in the schools, job retraining, and one of the first big pre-school programs. This direct involvement in community action in turn led to the inclusion of LAA. Its lawyers provide help for defendants in criminal cases and also advise people coming to the offices on all kinds of legal problems and initiate civil suits when necessary. Pincus was able to get this started by combining the Defender and gray-areas funds. Showing the poor how to initiate their own suits stirs up opponents most. "This is swaying the balance between two litigants," complains a New Haven lawyer, also a landlord. "The cards are stacked against the man of average means.

Insurance: But those on the other side pass a considerably better judgment. "I don't know what I would have done without it," says Mrs. Potts. Most of the 625 persons helped during the last eight months of 1965 had never had legal advice before. Says Frederick Danforth, director of the project: "We want to teach people the usefulness of a lawyer."

Another mark of success is imitation. The Office of Economic Opportunity has already started similar projects in 23 cities and hopes to spend $20 million this year. Predictably, mossback elements in the legal profession have charged the OEO program is "fomenting social unrest" and leading to "socialization" of lawyers.

The Ford men are delighted to see the government financing what they started, and they are now thinking ahead to other innovations, such as a legal-insurance plan patterned after Blue Cross. Because of the recent Supreme Court decision and programs like Ford's, Pincus notes, "communities now have a new category to think about—justice."

years after its commencement, a blackboard in the office of vice president Thomas P. Nickell Jr. gives a daily bulletin on the school's progress in matching a $7.5 million Ford grant on a basis of $3 for every $1 of Ford's. "A Ford grant," says Nickell, "is viewed as an international stamp of approval."

The Shadow: But foundations are finding it is harder than ever to make a real difference. Money doesn't buy as much as it used to, and foundations are a relatively smaller source of money in the society than they used to be. "Foundations," predicts Cornell president James A. Perkins, "are not going to have the visibility they used to have. Ford is the only one left with enough money to go into an area and create a real change in institutions. But ten years from now even Ford won't be big enough to change institutions."

The Federal government casts the major shadow over the foundation's path, and staying ahead of Washington's public philanthropy, admits Ford vice president W. McNeil Lowry, "is a far more acute and difficult job in 1966 than ever before." Foundation ideas are being pirated before foundations have had a chance to work them out. Some of the cutting-edge thinking behind Ford's gray-areas program was quickly adopted by the War on Poverty. The government has moved in so quickly, in fact, that foundation officers often fly to Washington for briefings on what's new.

As politically daring as the Great Society appears to be, there still remain many areas where government fears to tread or lacks the necessary dexterity. And even though government may spend more, foundations can make a considerable case for not deserting their former pastures. "Counter-cyclical giving" is the foundation phrase for it, meaning that private money can be used to correct distortions or fill in the gaps of government programs. "I'm becoming a great believer in competition in the public interest," says Paul N. Ylvisaker, director of Ford's public-affairs program.

Appraiser: Another option for foundations is the job of public investigator and appraiser—both of what is happening with Washington's money and in other areas of society. The Rockefeller Brothers Fund demonstrated the possibilities of foundation appraisals in a series of six reports on public policy in 1958-60, and top Carnegie officials feel one of Carnegie's most important roles in the future may be in evaluations of government and other institutions.

Of the various outlets for foundation money and imagination, however, the problems of civil rights, and the poverty and disintegration in the cities may offer the greatest opportunities, even if most foundations have been slow in seizing them. The inability of the government to assure civil rights by law and the still inconclusive battles being fought in the poverty war have left plenty of room for "risk capital" to maneuver, but foundations as a group have hesitated to act.

It is ironic that most foundations should have been so myopic about civil rights. The first substantial foundation in the United States, the Peabody Education Fund, spent much of its money on Negro education in the Reconstruction South, and Carnegie initiated and supported Gunnar Myrdal's study of the Negro in America which produced his epochal book, "An American Dilemma." But it took the Civil Rights Act to pry loose much money for Negro aid outside schools. In 1964 all foundations spent $2.3 million on race relations. The figure jumped to a still modest $27 million last year. An official of the Urban League, which has received some support, feels foundations "have just been piddling. They still retain the stereotypes. They ask, what does the Negro want?"

Small Voices: Getting out of the universities and into the streets involves real risk. "We don't need to do all that much more thinking," declares Harvard's McClelland, "we need some people acting. And we need some new types of institutions to allow us to bring the know-how we already have to bear on the actual problem." On the whole only small foundations have been willing to try. The Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation has used some of its small resources to aid SNCC workers, and the $43 million Field Foundation, in civil rights since 1944, last year aided a program of voter-registration education for Southern Negroes and supported a program to help communities adjust when Negroes move into white Chicago suburbs. Taconic and New World are two other small foundations with imaginative social-action programs. Unfortunately, these have been only small voices, usually speaking without major foundation assistance.

There are hopes that Ford, which has supported education and now the arts so lavishly, will soon accelerate its work on social problems. It has recently been active in planning projects for the Watts section of Los Angeles. And McGeorge Bundy is not a man with patience for overextended studies. He has said he appreciates "applied intelligence"—knowledge that reflects "a sense of political responsibility, with an awareness that action has consequences." He is likely to seek the same sort of consequential thought at Ford.

The foundation has already started to "think about what schools will be like in the 21st century," a project which involves thinking about what the cities of that time will be like. Says Bundy, "I don't think there's any shortage of problems and opportunities for foundations."

Peggy at 17

Neophyte skater Peggy Fleming was 12 years old when the jet airliner carrying the entire U.S. figure-skating team crashed in Brussels in 1961. All eighteen American skaters and most of their trainers and officials were killed, including three close friends of Peggy's and her coach, Bill Kipp. "I was still young," she recalls, "and it was too hard to believe. It took time to get over it."

It took U.S. figure-skating fortunes time to recover, too. "To become an expert skater," said Pierre Brunet, who coached America's Carol Heiss to an Olympic championship in 1960, "takes from six to ten years, depending on the individual."

Brunet was partly right. From 1961 to last week's finals for the 1966 championship at Davos, Switzerland, no American skater had come close to a world or Olympic title. Then petite Peggy Fleming showed how one determined individual could go beyond expert status to perfection in just five years.

Not long after the crash, shy Peggy began a grueling schedule which gradually escalated to her present six-day-a-week agenda: she rises daily at 5 a.m., practices from 6 to 10:30, goes to high school or, on Saturdays, rests and practices again at 5:30 p.m. for two hours. The family makes the required sacrifices, too. It costs the Flemings about $5,000 annually for Peggy's lessons, ice time, travel and costumes. To pay the bills, her father, Albert Fleming, works overtime as a newspaper pressman.

Altitude: In 1964, Peggy won the first of her three national titles, following it up with a sixth-place in the 1964 Winter Olympics and third in last year's international meet in Colorado Springs, Colo. But Peggy, who learned to skate in Cleveland at 9, might have done better at Colorado Springs if she hadn't been fatigued by the high-altitude competition. Her father, who can work anywhere, and whose family has lived in 40 states, thought of the 1966 meet at 5,164-foot-high Davos and remedied that. He moved his wife and four daughters from California to Colorado Springs. His new house is a half-mile from the Broadmoor Hotel's excellent facilities and his daughter now has the benefit of Italian-born Carlo Fassi's coaching. "Peggy is built to be a good dancer," Fassi said of his 108-pound protégé. "We have been building up her stamina."

Peggy, now 17 years old, went to Davos brimming with confidence. The auburn-haired high-school senior wore a 10-gallon hat off the ice to show people she was a Westerner. And on the rink, in her lavender-colored costume, she coolly went into each move as if she never made a mistake in her life. "There are lots of disappointments," she says of her errors, then adds: "Sometimes I fight against being human."

Peggy Fleming's winning form at Davos: 'Built . . .

Matched against 1965 winner Petra Burka of Canada (only four defending champions have lost in 60 years) and Gabriele Seyfert of East Germany for the title, Peggy all but clinched the women's championship on the first day. Her compulsory figures, which count for 60 per cent of the total score, were nearly flawless. But instead of protecting a solid 49-point lead over Miss Burka with careful routines, Peggy decided on an all-out exhibition in free-skating. "I have to leave her alone when the big day comes," Fassi says. "She knows exactly what she's doing and always chooses the best part of the ice."

Leaping through double axels and pirouetting in a bright winter sun, Peggy gracefully skated away with the title. After her four-minute routine, she squinted to catch the nine judges' score cards. Smiling wryly, she counted off nine 1's—for perfect.

REPORT TO THE SRC DEVELOPMENT COMMITTEE
From Josephine Wilkins, Chairman
April 29, 1966

Since this is the first meeting of the Committee under the new appointments, let me begin with a brief review of it to date.

You will recall that the Development Committee was created by the Executive Committee and held its organizational meeting shortly before the 1964 Annual Meeting of SRC. Its assignment was three-fold: to plan for the long-range funding of SRC, to advise with the staff on it, and to assist as it could with the funding.

You will further recall that the Committee grew out of pressure from two sources, pressure from some of SRC's major foundation support, and pressure from the state Councils on Human Relations. The foundations felt that the time had come when SRC should begin looking to the South itself for support to meet the cost of its general operation, and to foundations for special-project support only. The state Councils were vocal in their feeling that they were not participating proportionately in the financial growth of SRC, pointing out that SRC grants to them had remained approximately the same since 1957 when they were made independent bodies.

Meanwhile, as a result of the large special-project grant from the Ford Foundation and the agreement as to the per cent that will go to general operation for administration, SRC's financial situation has eased markedly for the next three years. And the $300,000 three-year grant to SRC from Ford for support of the state Councils has eased their situation for that time as well. Still, we nonetheless have before us the long-range planning for the funding of SRC.

I would like to summarize what seems to me to be the results thus far from the establishment of the Committee.

One, SRC has always been a staff operation, and an excellent one. It has had ad hoc committees appointed from policy for specific tasks, such as selecting a speaker, a new director, making nominations; and had standing committees from policy that serve actually as review boards for staff recommendations. But in creating the Development Committee, SRC has for the first time in its history set up a standing committee composed of policy members for involvement in the funding of the organization.

Two, for the first time an attempt has been made to involve the entire membership in the problems of SRC's funding, done through the letter you each sent last fall with the approval of the Executive Committee, to those Council members in your state.

Three, in structuring the Committee with one member from each state, SRC seems to have hit upon a vehicle that can be used at times to bring the entire Council membership closer to SRC, i.e., by each committee member assuming responsibility for contacting the other SRC members in his state, as illustrated by your letters last fall.

Four, reports from the Committee members indicate that dialogue has been started in each of the states that should in time result in some financial support, for either the state Councils or SRC.

Five, there has been an increase in the number of SRC members giving financial support to the Council, a sort of symbolic evidence of involvement. The letters sent by you last fall resulted in an increase from four member contributors in '64, to eighteen last year, for the amount of $3,545. This included two $1,000 contributions which unlocked an equal amount of Stern's matching grant, making the yet modest total of $5,545.

Six, lastly, and the most important, the Committee has worked its way through numerous funding ideas, and in the process a far clearer picture of SRC's funding situation and its potentials comes into focus.

The costs of the Committee have thus far been slight, $547 up to the end of the year. To this should now be added $190, expense of a recent trip made by the Executive Assistant to talk with certain of those with whom he was associated when he was executive director of the Florida Council on Human Relations. This brings the total cost to date to $746.

Obviously, to fill in any sense the assignment given us has required thought in depth on SRC. And one naturally has begun with a fresh look at what we have here.

We have an organization operating in an area caught up in social revolution, and itself a significant part of that revolution.

An organization dependent upon the public for financial support. And one now grown to a million-dollar operation -- nothing comparable has ever before been made available for such work in the South!

We have an operation carried on in the name of one hundred people over the South, who meet once a year and who place their confidence in fifteen people, the Executive Committee, who in turn meet quarterly and place their confidence, in the final analysis, in one person, the Executive Director.

We have an operation grown at such a pace these past years that it has raced, so to speak, to keep up with itself. I am close enough to the office to know what this has meant for the staff. For Les, and particularly for Paul, confronted as he was with administration of the large special-projects grant from Ford almost immediately on taking office last October.

We have an organization that has always been foundation oriented, supported mainly by national foundations. Because of this we have been able to build a major organization in the South and carry on work counter to the prevailing mores of the South.

We are now in the process of long-range planning to broaden the base of SRC's support to the South itself. And make no mistake about it, the decisions made and the pattern set will affect markedly the future of SRC.

Let me point up some of our groping for a right pattern for this broader funding.

It seems already clear that promotion of bequests, a source of unrestricted funds, should be included in any plan for future support. And as a general policy, that as potential contributors, individuals over the South should be left to the state Councils.

We have found southern foundations to be numerous, but with few exceptions small, their purposes not only quite limited but restricted mostly to paliatives, and all committed even more so than the national foundations to the general policy of making grants to projects only. Hardly without exception their trustees are from that sector frequently termed "the establishment."

I have had several conferences with two of the larger Atlanta foundations, their executive friends of longstanding. On my last visit to one of them, undoubtedly in a gesture of cooperation, he talked frankly about the making of grants. "Foundation trustees are on the whole conservative," he said, "and they are disturbed by changes taking place. Consciously or unconsciously, this influences their decisions. In considering an application they invariably look down the roster of board members for those in whom they have confidence. SRC needs," he said, "to bring onto its board some people like....," naming several of Atlanta's most conservative financial leaders.

Over the years, SRC has worked on quietly in the South. By and large, the southern status quo, so to speak, does not know that the Council exists. But foundation officials call for records, as they should, and make a thorough study of an organization applying for a grant. One is left with the question as to whether SRC could have become the organization it now is, or year after year could have continued as the constructive force it has been in the South, had some of those so influential as the usual southern foundation official quietly expressed concern over the work. We will doubtless need careful selectivity here in the future funding of SRC.

Still, the enlightened self-interest of the great national business corporations may yet prove to be the most potential source of unrestricted future support for the Council. Certainly we should be able to make a telling case of SRC's role thus far in the growth of the South and the organization's potential in that future growth. Numerous advisory conferences along this line have taken place, and it is in this field that my own interest and committee work has been mainly centered. But here we need to think large, and not proceed without well thought-out plans and supportive data.

The Executive Director feels that SRC might possibly be able to provide for its general operation costs in still another way. Continue to seek and rely on the national foundations for special-project funds, but with their approval increase to 20% the amount regularly assigned to general operation for administration. Then try to build up our sale of materials to where the amount from that source, together with the 20%, the interest from funds held and invested, and such other foundation funds as we might receive, would collectively meet the cost of general operation.

I lay these thoughts before you for whatever help they may be as we continue our effort to meet the Committee's assignment.

FORD FINDS PERIL IN SOCIAL UNREST

FOUNDATIONS

Asserts Nation Must Erase Conditions That Lead to 'Anger and Frustration'

DETROIT, May 3—Henry Ford 2d suggested today that the nation "must move more rapidly to solve its social problems and thereby eliminate the conditions that breed anger and frustration and blind rebellion."

Mr. Ford, in a speech prepared for delivery tonight, traced a gloomy "common thread" in contemporary American life and found "a strong element of antagonism and mistrust" that he said threatened "order and responsibility and tradition."

Mr. Ford, board chairman of the Ford Motor Company, warned:

"The greatest danger to a civilized nation is the man who has no stake in it, and nothing to lose by rejecting all that civilization stands for."

"Those who are more fortunate," Mr. Ford asserted, "including the leaders of the business world, have a duty to their country and themselves to join the war on poverty, on discrimination, on ignorance, on unemployment."

Cites Social Ills

The industrialist, who assumed direction of the world's third-largest manufacturing complex in 1945 and now holds $70-million worth of company stock, noted that there were "too many people in poverty, too many unemployed, too many living in slums, too many victims of prejudice and discrimination."

"The economic and technological triumphs of the past few years have not solved as many problems as we thought they would," Mr. Ford said, "and, in fact, have brought us new problems we did not foresee."

Mr. Ford was to deliver his remarks at a dinner session of the annual convention of the National Association of Purchasing Agents in Cobo Hall. He cited a series of social ills, among them the following:

¶The growth of violence in our national life, including urban crime, juvenile vandalism, and "irresponsible and lawless protests and demonstrations by young people in the name of peace or free speech or civil rights or white supremacy."

¶The excessive power of labor unions "under the law," which leads to "senseless strikes that do great harm to the public."

Excerpts From Ford's Talk in Detroit

Special to The New York Times

DETROIT, May 3—Following are excerpts from the prepared text of a speech today by Henry Ford 2d to the 51st annual convention of the National Association of Purchasing Agents:

The economic and technological triumphs of the past few years have not solved as many problems as we thought they would and, in fact, have brought us new problems we did not foresee.

What really counts, when we measure social progress, is not the ingenuity of technology or the growth of national product, but the quality of our society and our individual lives. The basic measures of social achievement are such things as human satisfaction and fulfillment and the growth of harmony, goodwill and respect among men.

Our progress in these essentials has, I fear, been far less than our technological and economic progress. Of course, it's impossible to put a yardstick to the essentials of the good life. We can compute the gross national product; we cannot compute gross national satisfaction for good will.

The material and technical and scientific progress we have been making in recent years has not yielded, to my way of thinking, the satisfactions we had hoped for.

I'm troubled by the growth of violence in our national life—by the riots in Watts and Chicago and New York and other cities — by the growth of urban crime — the juvenile vandalism — by violent resistance to the laws guaranteeing the civil rights of all citizens — by the slaughter resulting from the crime of drunken driving.

I am troubled also by irresponsible and lawless protests and demonstrations by young people in the name of peace or free speech or civil rights or white supremacy. I am troubled by the tendency toward rebellion for its own sake.

I am disturbed that year after year nothing is done to moderate the excessive powers of labor unions under the law. Irresponsible unions indulge in senseless strikes that do great harm to the public, in order to enforce demands that limit productivity, increase inflationary pressure and reduce employment. It seems to me that we could find ways to correct the abuses committed by some unions without impairing the ability of unions to carry out their important, legitimate functions in our economy.

On the national political scene, I am troubled most by the evident growth of the far right and by the extreme stands of the ultra-liberals on the other side. When political strength settles at the extremes, compromise becomes impossible and moderation disappears. The only alternatives are deadlock—if the parties are equal in strength — or crushing defeat for the weaker side. In either case, the byproducts are bitterness and frustration.

With the hardening of extreme political positions, there is a growing tendency to assume that the function of politics is to induce everyone to fall in line behind some particular set of policies. I have always thought that the function of the political process was to provide a forum for the accommodatio n of conflicting views — rather than to convert everyone to the true faith.

Our nation always needs the strong opposition party, but this does not mean that the parties must be diametrically opposed on major issues. On the contrary, it means that both parties must be sufficiently within the mainstream of public opinion to have a real chance at the polls and therefore a real opportunity to influence policy.

I am concerned about the persistence within some elements in our national political life of the idea that business is the enemy of the people. Now, I don't expect that everybody will love the businessman, I don't expect business to be immune from investigation, criticism and regulation. Like everyone else, businessmen are often selfish, short-sighted and irresponsible and need to be called to account. Nevertheless after the experience of the past few years I should have thought that the connection between the pursuit of profit and the public welfare would be somewhat better recognized than it often seems to be. And I should have thought that fewer people would still be building careers by casting themselves as St. George slaying the business dragon.

The current traffic safety controversy is a good example of what I mean. I think it is fair to say that until very recently, most of the initiative for the improvement of traffic safety came from the automobile industry rather than from the public or from Government. Nevertheless, with the benefit of hindsight, I wish that we in the industry had done even more even sooner. Like everyone else who shares the responsibility for traffic safety—and this includes the general public and Government at all levels—we did not act soon enough and vigorously enough to help combat the rising toll of highway accidents.

On the other hand, the progress of traffic safety would have been served better by a more moderate and rational discussion. Automobiles have been subjected to much irresponsible and uninformed criticism. Too much effort has been devoted to assessing guilt, too little to the rational search for constructive solutions. The potential for improving safety through changes in vehicle design has been exaggerated, and the potential for major change through improvements in highways, drivers and law enforcement have been played down.

Before I end this catalogue of complaints, I should like to comment on one more very disturbing aspect of the political scene. As inflation picks up speed, the Government is putting more and more emphasis on the guideposts for prices and wages.

I have no quarrel with the idea that Government has a duty to remind private citizens of their responsibilities to the nation. But the Government has moved on from reminders to a considerable amount of pressure, applied mainly to business, and in a very few cases to labor. In effect, we are moving toward a kind of informal and very spotty price and wage control.

We are most fortunate, at this difficult time, to have the benefit of President Johnson's wise leadership. If we face our problems realistically, we can solve them and move on to new ones as we always have.

It seems to me that almost all of the specific problems I have mentioned have a common thread. The common thread is a strong element of antagonism and mistrust — antagonism between the young and their elders, between whites and Negroes, between people and their government, between conservatives and liberals, between many people — especially young people — and everything that stands for order and responsibility and tradition.

Perhaps the most important part of the answer is that our nation must move rapidly to solve its social problems and thereby eliminate the conditions that breed anger and frustration and blind rebellion. The greatest danger to a civilized nation is the man who has no stake in it, and nothing to lose by rejecting all that civilization stands for.

Those who are more fortunate, including the leaders of the business world, have a duty to their country and themselves to join the war on poverty, on discrimination, on ignorance, on unemployment. As long as these evils persist, our society will be diminished by crime and violence and demogoguery. In a country where business plays so important a role, it will always be a prime target for the demagogue who thrives in a climate of frustration and rebellion. The free enterprise system will not gain the respect and the acceptance it needs until all men share in the abundance that system provides.

Ford Finds Danger in Unrest, Bids Nation Erase Social Ills

national politics. He warned that the byproducts of political extremism were "bitterness and frustration."

¶More and more emphasis on the Federal Government's wage-price guideposts that supposedly restrain inflation by urging business and labor to hold wage and price increases within specified limits. Mr. Ford said the country was moving "toward a kind of informal and very spotty price and wage control."

¶The idea that business is the enemy of the people. He said he did not expect business to be immune from investigation, criticism and regulation, but "I should have thought that few people would still be building careers by casting themselves as Saine George slaying the business dragon."

Defense Auto Safety

The last point led Mr. Ford into another appraisal of the safety controversy.

"I think it is fair to say that until very recently, most of the initiative for the improvement of traffic safety came from the automobile industry rather than from the public or from government. Nevertheless, with the benefit of hindsight, I wish that we in the industry had done even more even sooner. Like everyone else who shares the responsibility for traffic safety—and this includes the general public and government at all levels—we did not act soon enough and vigorously enough to help combat the rising toll of highway accidents."

Mr. Ford asserted that the automobile had been "subjected to much irresponsible and uninformed criticism. He deplored that fact that the safety controversy had not been marked by "a more moderate and rational discussion." The potential for improvement through vehicle design changes, Mr. Ford said, is "exaggerated."

Books That Are 'Fun to Read'

AC 5/12/66

An early childhood memory is of moving from a farm on the Tennessee River to the city of Chattanooga and of discovering the public library with its seeming acres of books. It was an excitement of considerable intensity. To be able to go every day and get a new book (if one could read that fast) was a never-ending wonder and delight.

An even greater pleasure was to have books that one owned. Most of us remember the first book read. Mine was read at about six years of age. It was about a missionary's small son in Africa and the experiences he and his playmates had with animals.

To have books that were one's very own was a pleasure not easily described. To be able to read and to like to read and to have books is a gift beyond compare.

All this is a preamble to one of today's problems and the beginning of doing something about it. The problem is that hundreds of thousands of children are learning to be able to read. But for many of them books are not easily come by—especially the adventure of looking over books and choosing one just for the pleasure of reading. A shocking number of homes have no books in them.

Book Grants

The Fund for the Advancement of Education, established by the Ford Foundation, has made grants totaling $486,500 for a series of experiments designed to encourage the reading and ownership of pleasurable books by disadvantaged children and adults. The books involved are not textbooks. They are the kind one reads for pleasure.

The books involved are not textbooks. They are the kind one reads for pleasure.

Volunteers in Service to America (VISTA) will be one of the organizations using funds for the grants. These volunteers work in urban slums, in areas of rural poverty, on Indian reservations, and in migrant worker camps. They work with persons of all ages.

The Fund grant will enable VISTA to equip its workers with lightweight portable libraries that will double as display racks. Titles in each "library" will vary according to the needs and capacities of the people at hand. Consultants from the National Book Committee will prepare advisory lists, but there will be maximum participation by the volunteers themselves.

The Southern Association of Colleges and Schools is another agency participating in the grant. It will establish small libraries of high quality paperback books at predominantly Negro colleges and universities.

More than a hundred institutions will have a part in this experiment. A 12-member committee of faculty members, librarians and student leaders from these institutions has prepared a list of some 1,800 titles from which selections may be made.

Honor System

These will not be "library" books. They will be made readily available to students and will be loaned on the honor system. On many campuses the student government will be responsible for operating the experiment.

Smaller grants will finance experiments in other areas. North Carolina's statewide comprehensive school improvement project will enable about 17,000 children in 192 schools to select books for reading pleasure.

Some 800 small, isolated rural schools in Arizona, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico and Utah will receive special "libraries" of children's books. Most of the near 20,000 youngsters in these schools do not have access to books that are "fun to read."

Similar experiments in other regions will enable the Fund to provide books for many thousands of adults and children. The experiment is designed to encourage the reading and ownership of books. It is a good experiment that can hardly fail.

Church and Lay Groups Join in Housing Drive

NEW YORK — Several large Protestant denominations and secular groups have agreed to pool their resources in a multi-million dollar effort to stimulate the construction of low-rent housing throughout the country.

The new project is the first of its scope to involve both religious and secular agencies. It was announced by Urban America, Inc., a private nonprofit urban planning group here that will administer the program. It will be supported by several major churches, individuals and foundations, including the Ford Foundation.

The project will seek to encourage the formation of nonprofit corporations to sponsor low-rent housing throughout the country and to offer such groups enabling funds and technical assistance.

The United Church of Christ is already committed to the program, and approval is expected soon from the United Presbyterian Church in the USA, the Protestant Episcopal Church and the Methodist church. The American Baptist Convention is considering participation.

Stephen R. Currier, president of Urban America, said the program will use an annual operating budget of approximately $1 million to release "hundreds of millions more" in federally insured mortgages and interest and rent subsidies under Federal Housing Legislation.

Dear Brooke:

Remarkably, we had just completed the information requested on receipt of your letter of July 18.

Enclosed is a narrative report of the school desegregation conferences, an accounting by state of the funds expended and our check for $3,686.13 representing the unexpended balance.

This was a good program and we are grateful to the New World Foundation for having made it possible.

Best.

FORD FUND URGES F.C.C. TO CONSIDER NEW TV SATELLITE

Bundy Suggests Commercial Relay Income Be Used to Aid Educational Video

PROPOSAL CHALLENGED

Comsat and A.T.&T. Say Agency Lacks Authority to Approve System

The text of Bundy's letter will be found on Page 18.

By JACK GOULD

A revolutionary nationwide satellite television system that would use profits from the relay of commercial TV shows to finance noncommercial video was proposed yesterday by the Ford Foundation.

The country's largest philanthropic organization, through its new president, McGeorge Bundy, asked the Federal Communications Commission to consider creation of a nonprofit corporation to distribute TV programs across the county by satellite.

The step brought the foundation into immediate conflict with the Communications Satellite Corporation (Comsat) and the American Telephone and Telegraph Company. Both declared the commercial carriers should operate domestic satellites.

Social Usefulness Stressed

The Ford Foundation plan envisaged using the income derived from the national distribution of such shows as "Batman" and "Bonanza" to support a coast-to-coast live network of information and culture for home viewers, at least four channels of instructional TV for colleges and schools and six commercial channels.

Four satellites—one in each time zone—could each carry the 11 channels.

Mr. Bundy, president of the foundation since March 1, said the long-range social usefulness of the home screen should take priority over the possible loss of a "microscopic portion" of the total profitability of commercial communication carriers.

Mr. Bundy urged the F.C.C. to delay any thought of making an exclusive award of TV satellites to commercial carriers until the regulatory agency could explore other systems.

Authority Is Challenged

The basic idea of tapping program relay income to expand national educational TV originated chiefly with Fred W. Friendly, former president of the news division of the Columbia Broadcasting System. Mr. Friendly is now television adviser to Mr. Bundy.

The foundation contended that the F.C.C. already has the power to authorize such a satellite system and that the act creating Comsat anticipated additional systems to meet unique national needs.

Comsat, in a brief that did not refer to the Ford plan, told the F.C.C. that it was sole chosen instrument of Congress to operate satellite systems and that the commission lacked authority to authorize a rival.

A.T.&T. submitted a brief arguing that it would be against "expressed national policy" to authorize satellite systems outside the framework of the commercial communications carriers. A.T.&T. added that licensing of private satellite systems would throw added economic burdens on other customers of communications circuits.

The American Broadcasting Company, the National Broadcasting Company and C.B.S., on the other hand, expressed immediate approval, in principle, of the Ford concept, but reserved comment on the plan's details.

The commercial networks said that the Ford idea held the promise of providing financial stability for educational TV while reducing the networks' costs in delivering shows to affiliated stations.

The Department of Health, Education and Welfare vigorously supported recommendations that the F.C.C. carefully study satellite systems that might offer major advantages to education.

N.E.T. Hails Plan

The Carnegie Commission for Educational Television, a private citizens' group organized with the encouragement of President Johnson, warned against precipitous decisions in resolving assignment of satellites.

John F. White, president of National Educational Television, which now supplies taped programs to 104 educational TV stations, said the Ford plan would represent "a giant stride forward" for noncommercial video.

The heart of the Ford plan is the assumption, shared by virtually all communications economists and engineers, that the future of television networks lies in satellites placed in fixed positions over the four different time zones of the United States.

At present, television programs are relayed over facilities on the ground, either microwave towers or coaxial cables. Such circuits interconnecting hundreds of cities are necessary because a TV signal does not travel on its own momentum beyond the line of sight.

With a satellite system, TV programs would be beamed skyward a distance of 22,300 miles to an electronic sphere in synchronous orbit with the earth's

Bundy's Letter to F.C.C. on a TV Satellite System

Following is a letter from McGeorge Bundy, president of the Ford Foundation, to Rosel H. Hyde, chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, transmitting the foundation's proposals to the F.C.C. for the construction and operation of a domestic communications satellite system:

Aug. 1, 1966

Dear Mr. Chairman:

I have the honor to submit herewith a statement from the Ford Foundation which responds to the invitation of the Federal Communications Commission for "the views and comments of interested parties" on "proposals for the construction and operation of communications satellite facilities" by others than recognized common carriers. I am also addressing this same letter to each of the other Commissioners.

In this covering letter I want to summarize our conclusions—and also to explain informally the deep concern which moved us to make the studies which have led to this submission.

First, I note that the Ford Foundation has no commercial interest and no operating interest in this matter. We exist for the purpose of giving money away—as wisely and constructively as we can. This is the source of our deep interest in the present question.

We have a wider and longer experience of the effort to establish effective noncommercial television than any other single institution in the country. We have been by far the largest single source of funds for this effort. We have fifteen years of experience. We have made grants, directly and indirectly, of more than a hundred million dollars a year; currently we are making additional grants at the rate of more than ten million dollars a year.

From this experience we have learned three lessons:

(1) The first and most important lesson is that noncommercial television has unlimited potential, for human welfare and for the quality of American life. The best achievements of the best existing stations are proof enough—but there is still more powerful evidence in the best achievements of the best services abroad. And the most powerful evidence of all is in the all-but-unanimous conviction of the ablest men in American television today: that nothing is more needed—for television itself as well as for the country—than a first-rate national noncommercial service.

Present Services Inadequate

(2) The second lesson is

The New York Times

McGeorge Bundy, right, president of Ford Foundation, and his television adviser, Fred W. Friendly, former executive of Columbia Broadcasting System, at news session.

duce a prompt and constructive report. It will be good if we can avoid major decisions affecting the future of educational television until we have the benefit of the Carnegie report. A decision limiting the ownership and operation of communications satellites would be such a decision—and on this ground alone the commission would do well to avoid any ruling of this sort at this time.

Pressure for Decisions

But there are legitimate and important interests which are pressing for early decisions. The Ford Foundation can well understand the forces that could lead some to argue that great commercial questions should not be delayed for months while everyone waits for "one more report" on the future of educational television. Because Carnegie Commission is still at work, it is not in a position today to contest this point in detail. Yet it has seemed to us a matter of high importance that the public interest in the future of noncommercial television be fully and properly represented in the pleadings before your Commission. This is what our submission aims to do. Our right to present this view is the right of any element in our society to be understandably cautious about direct Federal financing of channels of communication to the public. A number of additional remedies have been suggested, and we must hope for more light on this from the Carnegie Commission, but the hard fact is that up to now no remotely adequate solution has been found. We all want educational television to be properly funded. We do not want the Government to "pay the piper and call the tune." We are looking for an answer.

And that is what makes the possibilities of satellites so extraordinarily important. Noncommercial television has two great needs: first, to become a true national network, at a cost it can afford—and second, to have money for programming at a wholly new level of excellence. Properly used, a television satellite can meet both needs. By its natural economic advantage over long landlines, it can effectively eliminate long-distance charges as a determining element in network choices—commercial and noncommercial alike.

And if in the case of commercial networks a major share of these savings is passed on to the noncommercial programmers, then both problems are on the road to money to get it off the ground? That is a fair question, but we are convinced that there are good answers—in the resources of the commercial networks, in the lending power of those who know a sure success when they see it, and in the resources of those who hold the view that money which helps to turn this corner will be money well used for the quality of American life. Our own commitment to this general purpose is clear.

We fully recognize the legitimate and reasonable needs of others who are concerned with satellite communications. We are convinced that our proposal does no significant harm to the legitimate and recognized interests of Comsat or the common carriers. With or without added responsibility for domestic television, Comsat will remain an unusually privileged commercial enterprise—a prime and protected investment with exclusive chartered rights in international satellite service.

Comsat faces international horizons which can engage its full energies for decades to come. The prosperity of all does not require for any a monopoly of the space communications available to the American people. And for the common carriers the revenue presently at issue is less than 1 per cent of a business which grows by more than that in every season of every year.

For all these reasons, we believe the door to a new and separate broadcast satellite service must not be closed. We do not now present a formal application. We think it right to wait for the report of the Carnegie Commission, and we also believe that the Ford Foundation should not undertake alone the framing of a formal application in a matter which relates to the interests and concerns of all Americans.

Model of a Solution

What we have done initially is to develop one possible model of a solution. We have tested it for technical feasibility with the professional counsel of Dr. Eugene Fubini of the International Business Machines Corporation. We have tested it against the laws with the help of Mr. David Ginsburg of Washington. We have tested its economic validity with the advice of Dr. Paul MacAvoy of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. We have tested it against the realities of television programming with the help of Mr. Fred Friendly, our adviser on television. We have tested it against our own experience

COMSAT OPPOSES RIVAL SYSTEMS

Sees Public Interest Periled —A. T. & T. Also Dissents

The Communications Satellite Corporation moved yesterday to assert a dominant position in the operation of communications satellites over the United States.

In a brief filed with the Federal Communications Commission, the corporation argued that it would not be in the public interest to set up private satellite systems. The Ford Foundation yesterday proposed a nonprofit system outside the Comsat bailiwick.

On the New York Stock Exchange, in a failing market for all stocks, Comsat closed yesterday at 48, down 1¾ points on a volume of 10,400 shares. Its high for the year was 64⅞ and its low, 37⅛.

If satellite authorizations were to be granted to groups other than Comsat, the corporation said, the over-all Congressional purpose in launching space-communication facilities would be "eroded beyond any reasonable hope of restoration."

Dual Responsibilities

"Comsat views itself as having been granted a trust of national importance," the corporation said.

"In addition to being charged with the interest of its stockholders, it considers itself as having been charged also, in the area of its charter, with the best interests of the United States in the broadest sense."

Comsat said that establishment of a rival satellite system might result in wasteful duplication of facilities in the limited-frequency spectrum.

The Federal Communications Commission, the corporation said, should determine that no further action be taken to permit the establishment of private satellite systems.

Comsat outlined to the F.C.C. a plan calling for a satellite system that would provide round-the-clock transmission of network TV and radio programs to affiliated stations as well as suchother communications services as telephone, Teletype, facsimile pictures and data transmission.

A two-satellite system could be launched by late 1969 and a four-satellite array by 1970, assuming approval came this year, Comsat said. The larger system would cost from $110-million to $120-million to set up, the corporation added.

While officials of Comsat had been informally advised of the broad outlines of the Ford plan no reference was made to the foundation in the corporation's brief.

Proposed Satellite Services

The Ford Foundation's description of the services its proposed domestic communications satellite system might provide included the following:

INFORMATIONAL SERVICES

Full and live coverage of significant hearings and debates.

Interpretation of news.

Interviews and discussions featuring outstanding leaders in all fields.

Documentaries on important international, national, regional, and local problems.

Live and filmed reports designed to give the American people a better understanding of the three branches of government at all levels.

Broadcasting coverage of national and local political campaigns, including free time, under appropriate safeguards, for candidates for political office.

CULTURAL SERVICES

Musical, dramatic, and literary events of high quality from any location in the country.

Programs featuring established works and artists as well as important new works and promising young artists.

Broadcasts covering the whole range of the humanities.

Special events, such as the opening performance of the Metropolitan Opera season, the premieres of important new symphonic works, plays presented in regional theaters as well as on Broadway, and performances direct from Lincoln Center, to name but a few.

Programs on the cultural life not only of this country but of nations throughout the world.

Program series devoted to the history of the United States and to the history of American institutions: the Presidency, the Supreme Court, the Congress, the public school system, the military establishment, the university.

Programs of quality and taste for children.

INSTRUCTIONAL SERVICES

Live instructional programs for an aggregate of 60 million students at all levels of education, with a new immediacy of communication between teacher and student.

Instructional materials which could be stored on tapes in schools, colleges and universities, and school system centers.

Special broadcasts of public events of special interest to students at a particular level or at all levels.

In-service training of teachers.

Carnegie Fund Favors a Study Of Satellite for Educational TV

By VAL ADAMS

The Carnegie Commission on Educational Television told the Federal Communications Commission yesterday that it is encouraging a study of a communications satellite system that would be specifically designed for noncommercial television. It emphasized, however, that it also is studying alternate methods of distributing programs.

Carnegie's comments were filed the same day the Ford Foundation proposed that the F.C.C. consider authorizing satellite transmission facilities for both commercial and noncommercial programs.

While conceding that national satellites might be advantageous in some cases, the Carnegie group warned that such a system presented problems of "educational monopoly and centralized control of instructional and other material." Of great importance, the state-lished late this year or early next.

Carnegie said that in its final report it hoped to discuss all problems of educational television and how new technologies, including satellites, "can be utilized to preserve and strengthen diversity, local responsibility and independence in our educational television system."

Playback Methods Cited

The commission said a comprehensive plan for distributing programs should be considered in the light of several forms of distribution technology. The statement added:

"Our technology panel confirms reports that inexpensive methods of recording and playback for color television programs will be available shortly, and that those methods may bear to visual presentation the relation that long-play phono-

Educational Television, a private citizens' group organized with the encouragement of President Johnson, warned against precipitous decisions in resolving assignment of satellites.

John F. White, president of National Educational Television, which now supplies taped programs to 104 educational TV stations, said the Ford plan would represent "a giant stride forward" for noncommercial video.

The heart of the Ford plan is the assumption, shared by virtually all communications economists and engineers, that the future of television networks lies in satellites placed in fixed positions over the four different time zones of the United States.

At present, television programs are relayed over facilities on the ground, either microwave towers or coaxial cables. Such circuits interconnecting hundreds of cities are necessary because a TV signal does not travel on its own momentum beyond the line of sight.

With a satellite system, TV programs would be beamed skyward a distance of 22,300 miles to an electronic sphere in synchronous orbit with the earth's rotation, thus giving the effect of a fixed facility in the sky. The satellite then beams the programs back to earth, where they can be picked up over a relatively wide area for rebroadcasting over conventional TV stations.

A Historic Occasion

Announcement of the Ford Foundation plan was the highlight of a day that will undoubtedly stand as a historic occasion in the evolution of broadcasting. Yesterday was the deadline fixed by the F.C.C. for initial comments on the American Broadcasting Company's original suggestion of a privately operated domestic TV satellite system.

The scope of the Ford proposal virtually assures a voluminous response, due Oct. 1, from all commercial, government and academic organizations interested in the destiny of TV. While nominally concerned with satellites, the cumulative effect of the ensuing dialogue could be an over-all appraisal of the TV medium.

In a covering letter to Rosel H. Hyde, F.C.C. chairman, Mr. Bundy stressed that the foundation was not making a formal application for a noncommercial system, but only was submitting a model for future consideration.

However, the "model" consisted of an 80-page social, economic and technical analysis complete with exhaustive detail.

The foundation said that use of satellite relay, rather than ground relay, of commercial shows might result in savings of $45-million annually, of which perhaps $30-million could be used for noncommercial TV.

The foundation estimated that the national broadcasting networks now spend $65-million for television and radio relay service from A. T. and T. The projected annual cost of a nonprofit satellite system performing the same functions was estimated at less than $20-million.

Free Political Broadcasts

On the cultural side, the foundation said that N. E. T. had been starved for enough funds to provide a first-class permanent system of noncommercial TV offering the finest in the arts.

On the informational side, the foundation called for in-depth news interpretation, documentaries and uninterrupted coverage of important public hearings. The brief also touched on the prospect of free political broadcasts, a step that could play a role in lowering the high costs of campaigning.

The foundation called its proposed operation the "Broadcasters' Non-Profit Satellite System," immediately abreviated as "B.N.S."

The Ford presentation stressed that the foundation itself would not operate such a system, but would urge selection of a board of trustees, representing commercial and noncommercial broacasters and public representatives, to set up the operating machinery.

country. We have been by far the largest single source of funds for this effort. We have fifteen years of experience. We have made grants, directly and indirectly, of more than a hundred million dollars a year; currently we are making additional grants at the rate of more than ten million dollars a year.

From this experience we have learned three lessons:

(1) The first and most important lesson is that noncommercial television has unlimited potential, for human welfare and for the quality of American life. The best achievements of the best existing stations are proof enough—but there is still more powerful evidence in the best achievements of the best services abroad. And the most powerful evidence of all is in the all-but-unanimous conviction of the ablest men in American television today: that nothing is more needed—for television itself as well as for the country—than a first-rate national noncommercial service.

Present Services Inadequate

(2) The second lesson is that existing services, and existing means of support, cannot hope to develop more than a fraction of this potential. The existing systems are much better than nothing. Compared to what this country deserves, they are a depressing failure. This is not the fault of the talented and dedicated men who have worked their hearts out for noncommercial television. It is the fault of all of us—in that we have not yet found a way to give this work the resources it needs. It can well be argued that we at the Ford Foundation have contributed to this failure. When we give $6-million a year to the National Educational Television and Radio Center (NET), we seem to have done a lot. And for us it is a lot—it is our largest continuing annual grant. But the brutal fact is that our big gift is much too small.

(3) The third lesson follows from the first two: it is that the nation must find a way to a wholly new level of action in this field—one which will release for our whole people all the enlightenment and engagement, all the immediacy and freedom of experience which are inherent in this extraordinary medium and which commercial services—as they freely admit—cannot bring out alone.

These three general conclusions are broadly shared, I believe, among all who have studied this problem—by leaders in the Congress, by the members and staff of your Commission, and by independent experts. They underlie the establishment last year of a distinguished commission of private citizens to study the future of non-commercial television, under a charge from the Carnegie Corporation and with encouragement from President Johnson. Under the chairmanship of Dr. James Killian that commission is working hard to prepare a report. A decision limiting the ownership and operation of communications satellites would be such a decision—and on this ground alone the commission would do well to avoid any ruling of this sort at this time.

Pressure for Decisions

But there are legitimate and important interests which are pressing for early decisions. The Ford Foundation can well understand the forces that could lead some to argue that great commercial questions should not be delayed for months while everyone waits for "one more report" on the future of educational television. Because Carnegie Commission is still at work, it is not in a position today to contest this point in detail. Yet it has seemed to us a matter of high importance that the public interest in the future of noncommercial television be fully and properly represented in the pleadings before your Commission. This is what our submission aims to do. Our right to present this view is the right of any element in our society to be heard. Our duty to do it grows from experience, expenditure, and the terms of our foundation's charter.

This right and this duty are made doubly urgent because of the promise that satellite communications may permit a revolution both in the technology and in the economics of television. Intensive exploratory studies have convinced us at the Ford Foundation that these revolutionary possibilities offer the promise of building a cost-free highway system for multiplied regional and national noncommercial services—and also of providing a large part of the new funds which are desperately needed for noncommercial programming at every level.

The model we present is one way, not the only way. We are sure it can be improved by public study and comment. The state of the art is changing so fast—and we have had so much to learn since March 2—that we are sure our present design can be improved by criticism. For this reason alone we would welcome hearings on this whole subject. And on wider grounds we are sure that any major restrictive action taken without hearings would be offensive to the public sense of fairness.

Looking For an Answer

While the financial needs of educational television are widely recognized, the sources of the needed funds have been elusive. With the shining exception of the Educational Television Facilities Act of 1962, the Federal Government as a whole has stood to one side (and the Act of 1962, with all its generosity and foresight, carries a total appropriation which is lower than the funds spent by the Ford Foundation alone in the years since the Act was passed).

Moreover, Americans are besides. But who has the for more light on this from the Carnegie Commission, but the hard fact is that up to now no remotely adequate solution has been found. We all want educational television to be properly funded. We do not want the Government to "pay the piper and call the tune." We are looking for an answer.

And that is what makes the possibilities of satellites so extraordinarily important. Noncommercial television has two great needs: first, to become a true national network, at a cost it can afford—and second, to have money for programming at a wholly new level of excellence. Properly used, a television satellite can meet both needs. By its natural economic advantage over long landlines, it can effectively eliminate long-distance charges as a determining element in network choices—commercial and noncommercial alike.

And if in the case of commercial networks a major share of these savings is passed on to the noncommercial programmers, then both problems are on the road to solution, and everyone is better off than he was before. This is not magic, or sleight-of-hand. It is a people's dividend, earned by the American nation from its enormous investment in space.

We are far from contending that a portion of the savings of the commercial users will pay for every possible program tomorrow. In our formal submission we estimate that such a system might produce $30-million a year for ETV programming almost at once, and perhaps twice that much within ten years. This is more than enough to start the revolution we seek—and there would be still more in the future.

The Desert Could Bloom

And all this, our analysis suggests, should be accompanied also by a wholly new level of investment—public and private—in the programs of live instruction that the satellite system invites. The satellite, used in the right way, can make the desert bloom for whole new areas of television. We do not claim that our way of doing it is the best. We do believe the best way must be found.

One cause of questioning may be the initial human effort of establishing a service of the sort that we suggest. Where can we find the first-rate men for a new nonprofit venture? We have considered this question, and we have asked a number of the best professionals for their opinion. Their verdict is unanimous. We are talking here about a vision of excellence for the life of all Americans. Good men will want to work for it. We are convinced the signal of approval for a system like this one would release a rush of talent for the leaders of the new enterprise.

There is also a question of money. Once it is started, the enterprise will surely pay for itself and for much good and separate broadcast satellite service must not be closed. We do not now present a formal application. We think it right to wait for the report of the Carnegie Commission, and we also believe that the Ford Foundation should not undertake alone the framing of a formal application in a matter which relates to the interests and concerns of all Americans.

Model of a Solution

What we have done initially is to develop one possible model of a solution. We have tested it for technical feasibility with the professional counsel of Dr. Eugene Fubini of the International Business Machines Corporation. We have tested it against the laws with the help of Mr. David Ginsburg of Washington. We have tested its economic validity with the advice of Dr. Paul MacAvoy of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. We have tested it against the realities of television programming with the help of Mr. Fred Friendly, our adviser on television. We have tested it against our own experience in the philanthropic support of noncommercial television.

We think this model is sound against all these tests. But our purpose in presenting it is not to ask the Commission to grant a license now, to us or to anyone else. Our immediate purpose is rather to urge the Commission to take no action now that would foreclose these possibilities.

We think the Commission should invite a more formal proposal from the widest possible public. We think such a proposal would be forthcoming. We think it would be compelling. We would be glad to join with others to present it. All that we feel it right to do today is to enter the strongest possible argument against any action that would close the door to this new hope for all Americans.

In summary, our underlying purpose is not to press for a particular solution, and still less to interfere in any way with the legitimate interests of others. Our purpose is to stress four fundamental propositions:

(1) the critical importance to American life of properly designed domestic communications satellite systems;

(2) the very great—and largely unstudied—potential of such systems for noncommercial television and for education in its widest sense;

(3) the possibility that the management of this new national resource and the rates charged for its use can be arranged in such a way as to provide adequate resources for a wholly new level of service to the American people; and

(4) the desirability of most careful deliberation before national decisions are reached with regard to the assignment of responsibility in this area.

This is a time for due process, and for greatness.

Sincerely,
McGEORGE BUNDY

Gemini's Fuel Loss Is Traced to Steering Strain

HOUSTON, Aug. 1 (AP) — The Gemini 10 spacecraft ran low on fuel because it had to make a large change of its plane to rendezvous with an Agena target satellite, the command pilot, John W. Young, reported today.

"We had to use the brute force method to overcome a large out-of-plane error," Commander Young told a news conference. "That takes quite a lot of fuel."

Maj. Michael Collins of the Air Force also disclosed that troubles in maneuvering in space had forced him to make three attempts before he finally retrieved an experiment package from the side of another Agena with which Gemini 10 rendezvoused.

The change of plane was required to shift Gemini 10 slightly to the north to put it in the same orbital path as the Agena, which had been orbited 101 minutes earlier on July 18.

Commander Young and Major Collins caught and docked with the Agena after a six-hour chase. But they used twice as much fuel as planned. As a result, ground controllers rearranged the flight plan considerably, utilizing the engine of the Agena to make several of the maneuvers. The fuel shortage also caused Major Collins to cut short a maneuver in space on the second day of the three-day flight.

"The machine performed magnificently," Commander Young said in discussing the Agena as he described a series of vivid movie pictures of the rendezvous and docking.

At one point in the movies, the 26-foot Agena disappeared in a flash of sunlight.

"That's a real problem in space," Commander Young said. "It's called sun-in-the-eyes. It causes the target to disappear. You have to apply a little back thrust and hope it reappears. With a plane, you'd just zip around the target to get away from the sun and pick it up again. But a spacecraft doesn't have that much fuel."

In discussing the firing of the Agena's main engine, which sent Gemini 10 to a record altitude of 476 miles, Commander Young said:

"Boy, it was really something. For 11 seconds [as the 16,000-pound thrust engine fired] we got a tremendous thrill."

Commander Young said that the use of the Agena had demonstrated that another satellite could be used as a tanker and a supplementary engine for manned spaceships.

During the flight Major Collins engaged in two work periods outside the spacecraft—one a "stand-up-maneuver," the second a full-scale "walk" over to an old Agena left in space by the Gemini 8 astronauts in March.

The first maneuver was cut short by chemical fumes that invaded the space suits of both men.

Major Collins reported he was standing on the seat, the upper part of his body thrust into space, when he first noted the trouble.

"I was trying to change the setting on a camera," Major Collins said. "But my eyes began watering badly and I could not see well. John was having similar trouble, so we thought it best to terminate the E.V.A. [extra-vehicular activity].

They sealed the hatch after 55-minutes, instead of 70, as planned.

The next day they caught the old Agena, a lifeless satellite that called for primarily optical techniques during the final stages of rendezvous.

ment of a rival satellite system might result in wasteful duplication of facilities in the limited-frequency spectrum.

The Federal Communications Commission, the corporation said, should determine that no further action be taken to permit the establishment of private satellite systems.

Comsat outlined to the F.C.C. a plan calling for a satellite system that would provide round-the-clock transmission of network TV and radio programs to affiliated stations as well as suchother communications services as telephone, Teletype, facsimile pictures and data transmission.

A two-satellite system could be launched by late 1969 and a four-satellite array by 1970, assuming approval came this year, Comsat said. The larger system would cost from $110-million to $120-million to set up, the corporation added.

While officials of Comsat had been informally advised of the broad outlines of the Ford plan no reference was made to the foundation in the corporation's brief.

The American Telephone & Telegraph Company also opposed any authorization of private domestic satellite carriers, saying they would slow the development of the new technology. The company urged the F.C.C. "to conclude in this finding that there can be no authorization of private satellite systems."

The telephone company pointed out that there were many difficult technical obstacles to overcome to avoid interference between satellites and other microwave radio services.

The view of Comsat and A.T.&T. that the F.C.C. should terminate consideration of systems outside the framework of commercial carriers was a major factor in prompting the Ford Foundation's move to "keep the door open" to other satellite concepts.

The Ford Foundation argued that the F.C.C. has broad discretionary powers to introduce new services in the public interest. It also noted that Section 102(d) of the legislative act creating Comsat did not "preclude the creation of additional satellite systems, if required to meet unique governmental needs or if otherwise required in the national interest."

The three commercial television networks, meanwhile, endorsed the Ford proposal to set up a communications satellite system for distributing commercial and noncommercial programs.

Julian Goodman, president of the National Broadcasting Company, said N.B.C. supported the Ford plan to the extent that it promised benefits of greater flexibility, improved quality of program service and substantial reductions in transmission costs.

John A. Schneider, president of the broadcast group of the Columbia Broadcasting System, said "the Ford Foundation proposal is an imaginative approach to a very vexatious problem."

Leonard H. Goldenson, president of the American Broadcasting Companies, commended the foundation and said "the plan appears to expand upon A.B.C.'s earlier suggestions in this same area." Last year, A.B.C. filed application with the F.C.C. to establish its own satellite system.

John F. White, president of the National Educational Television network, said the Ford proposal would make possible "a giant stride toward the ultimate effective service" noncommercial television must provide. He added:

"N.E.T. is fully prepared to accept the challenge and responsibility this proposal would place upon us as the national network for noncommercial television."

NEWARK, July 31—A 26-year-old motorist died early today of injuries suffered when he was struck by a car last night after getting out of his own auto on Route 1 near Newark Airport to check a noise in his engine. The victim was Lawrence S. Gamble of 137 Brunswick Street here.

Carnegie Fund Favors a Study Of Satellite for Educational TV

By VAL ADAMS

The Carnegie Commission on Educational Television told the Federal Communications Commission yesterday that it is encouraging a study of a communications satellite system that would be specifically designed for noncommercial television. It emphasized, however, that it also is studying alternate methods of distributing programs.

Carnegie's comments were filed the same day the Ford Foundation proposed that the F.C.C. consider authorizing satellite transmission facilities for both commercial and noncommercial programs.

While conceding that national satellites might be advantageous in some cases, the Carnegie group warned that such a system presented problems of "educational monopoly and centralized control of instructional and other material." Of great importance, the statement said, was program diversity and local responsibility in educational television.

The Carnegie Commission on Educational Television, which is making a study on how the medium can best attain its potential, was established last November by a $250,000 grant from the Carnegie Corporation, a philanthropic organization.

Endorsed by Johnson

The commission has the endorsement of President Johnson and is headed by Dr. James R. Killian Jr., chairman of the corporation of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

The Carnegie statement was filed in response to the F.C.C. invitation for comments of interested parties on the proposed establishment of satellite facilities. The F.C.C. was requested to take no definitive action until Caregie's forthcoming report on educational television is published late this year or early next.

Carnegie said that in its final report it hoped to discuss all problems of educational television and how new technologies, including satellites, "can be utilized to preserve and strengthen diversity, local responsibility and independence in our educational television system."

Playback Methods Cited

The commission said a comprehensive plan for distributing programs should be considered in the light of several forms of distribution technology. The statement added:

"Our technology panel confirms reports that inexpensive methods of recording and playback for color television programs will be available shortly, and that those methods may bear to visual presentation the relation that long-play phonograph records bear to audio reproduction and at a cost not greatly different."

Such methods for recording and playback of programs, the commission said, could affect the use of TV in classrooms. A teacher, free of the task of tuning in a station at a fixed hour, could select a video program from a library in the same manner as a phonograph record or a book.

Last Feb. 28, The New York Times reported that the C.B.S. Laboratories division of the Columbia Broadcasting System was developing a new device that reproduced motion pictures through a television set. C.B.S. denied the report.

Yesterday, C.B.S. declined to comment on the Carnegie statement that new methods of recording and playback of TV programs would be available soon. C.B.S. said it would stand on its earlier statment.

ARBITRATION CHANGE URGED IN AUSTRALIA

SYDNEY, Australia—One of Australia's senior industrial arbitration figures, Justice Taylor of Sydney, believes the present Australian arbitration system, in the legislative sense, has outlived its usefulness. Under this system, in force throughout Australia, arbitration courts and commissions sit in judgment on trade union claims and hand down decisions on minimum wages and conditions which are legally binding on both employers and employes.

Justice Taylor thinks the system is on the way out and that while parties in disputes will continue to use it, they will do so more as a basis for private negotiation.

Justice Taylor, who is to retire at the end of August after 24 years as president of the New South Wales Industrial Commission, told a Radio Australia correspondent in Sydney recently that he thought the arbitration system was too legalistic. Human problems cannot be settled strictly by a legal formula, he held, adding that the system had been conceived as a compulsory protective mechanism but this concept had been outdated by today's stronger unions and more buoyant economy.

New Anti-Perspirant Fast Replacing Old "Deodorants"

NEW YORK, N. Y. (Special) — After decades of familiar "deodorants," women are turning to an advanced new type of formula. And by the thousands they are finding it far more effective.

Called Mitchum Anti-Perspirant, it is fully effective as a deodorant, of course, but the important improvement is its unheard-of ability to keep underarms really dry. Even for thousands who perspire heavily!

Most women find Mitchum Anti-Perspirant so effective that they need use it only every third or fourth day regardless of bathing, though some women who perspire freely use it every day. And yet it is completely safe for normal skin and clothing.

"It really works!", is a typical comment of delighted users. Both those who perspire heavily and women who perspire moderately say they have never before known such luxurious underarm dryness.

Now available at all better drug and department stores. Liquid or cream. 90-day supply, $3.00.

Bundy Outlines Plans at Urban League Session

NYT 8/3/66

By M. S. HANDLER

Special to The New York Times

PHILADELPHIA, Aug. 2 — McGeorge Bundy, president of the Ford Foundation, announced here tonight that the foundation would play "its full part" in the struggle to help the Negroes achieve full equality. He described this struggle as "the most urgent domestic concern of this country."

Nevertheless, he warned the delegates at the 56th annual convention of the National Urban League that the size and complexity of the problem would need funds "enormously beyond our resources" or those of any single institution.

The greatest share of the burden, Mr. Bundy said, must fall on government at all levels and on business concersn "whose role is to provide new opportunities for all Americans."

Mr. Bundy said that within these limitations, the Ford Foundation would execute a program in four major fields—leadership, research, communications and justice—in addition to the current efforts on housing, jobs and education.

Mr. Bundy cautioned his listnerrs that "we will not work through any single chosen instrument or in any single field of activity."

As to the need for leadership, Bundy said:

"When I suggest that there is need for wider and stronger leadership both among Negroes and among whites, I intend no criticism whatever of the extraordinary achievements of those who have worked on both sides for progress, and also for goodwill. I am saying, rather, that these men and women need to be mulitplied. They need reinforcement. We hope we can help in this objective.

Asks 'Stronger Effort'

"We believe that a wider and deeper and stronger effort among white leaders is needed so that the white American can see the problem as it really is, and recognize his need to face it, and to act."

'And we believe that the hope and self-confidence of the Negro American can be strengthened as the leadership of Negroes who work peaceful progress is reinforced, all up and down the line."

Then, speaking as "a citizen and not as a foundation executive," Mr. Bundy said, "it seems to me that it is right and reasonable to suggest that the level of effort—financial and political and personal—which here required is fully comparable to the effort we now make as a nation in Vietnam."

Discussing the crisis of the great urban centers, Mr. Bundy asserted:

"Nothing would be more foolish for both white men and Negroes than the angry assumption that the cities of the future are the problems of one color only. We shall succeed or fail together in our great cities as in our whole society.

Having mastered this relatively easy technique, children provided with enough information could have chosen a new president of the Ford Foundation just as easily as its board of trustees did a year ago, when the premature retirement of Henry Heald presented the problem. Once it became known that McGeorge Bundy could be shaken loose from his post as President Johnson's Special Assistant for National Security Affairs, anyone could see that there was nobody else—certainly nobody else 46 years old—who joined so many interesting circles.

taken too seriously, having previously led a student revolt against the senior societies), he had the key to whatever clubs he might wish to enter. Collaborator in Henry Stimson's autobiography (his father had been assistant to Stimson when he was Secretary of War under Roosevelt), he was known and admired by the two generations of lawyers and judges for whom Stimson was a hero. Junior Fellow and Dean of the Faculty of Arts and Sciences at Harvard, 1953-61, and general manager of that institution's relations with neighboring M.I.T. (where Julius A. —"Jay"— Stratton, the new chairman of the Ford Foundation, was then provost), he had been a central figure in what one M.I.T. mathematician likes to call the Greater Cambridge Complex. Analyst, administrator and confidant for both Kennedy and Johnson, he had helped McNamara and Rusk revivify the central agencies of the American Government, and knew his way around Washington, both on the Hill and in the valleys, as few other men in America. He was even friendly with the press.

Still, according to John J. McCloy, the Wall Street lawyer, former High Commissioner for Germany and president of the World Bank who was Ford's chairman when the decision had to be made, all these factors were secondary. "The most striking argument in Mac's favor," McCloy said the other day, "was the quality of his mind. When it became apparent that he might be available—we'd originally thought he wouldn't be—we had to review the list we were considering. We'd been looking at A's, of course; but Mac was an A+; he was a cut above."

This qualification was not inevitable. The lawyer and novelist Louis Auchincloss, who has known Bundy from Groton days, says that "he was ready to be Dean of the Faculty at Harvard when he was 12 years old"—but foundations have not in the past looked to this cadre for their top leadership. Rich and established organizations do not normally wish to place their destinies in the grasp of a really supercharged intelligence: brilliance is undependable, not because it makes more mistakes than sober dullness, but because its mistakes are so immensely plausible. And Bundy would never have taken the job without an assurance that he and his staff would have great freedom to make mistakes. He was waited on by McCloy, Stratton and Henry Ford; and speaking for the trustees they assured him that, in his words, "if you were straight with them, gave them the chance to look at it before you launched it on the unsuspecting world, they were eager for new ideas. There was no unwillingness—as a conscious desire—to move into the hot firing lines."

The secret was that, coming into the second half of its second decade—despite the "ff"s on its sugar cubes, the lovely typography of its many reports, the aggressive neutrality of its modern décor, the imperturbable manners of all its people —Ford felt itself neither established nor particularly rich. Personnel was about to shift drastically, with or without a new boss.

"We have an inflexible rule," says one of the old-timers. "Staff people must retire at 65, trustees at 70. Within five years of December, 1965, when Mac agreed to accept this job, nearly all the trustees and all but one of the senior policy staff people must move out. It's more nearly a clean slate than it has been at any time since '51. Before now, Mac might have found this job less his cup of tea—might have (Continued on Page 142) felt that there were too many guys around here who had patents." The old-timer paused and made a face.

"But maybe not," he added. "Mac has a lot of brass."

THE Ford Foundation has over the years paid nearly one-half the total cost of educational television in America. Its grant to the symphony orchestras last spring amounted to three times the total annual box-office take of such institutions. Single-handed, it has rekindled the fires of hope in our decaying private liberal arts colleges, and loosened the noose with which the mortuary class of education professors were choking off access to the teaching profession.

Its demonstration programs span the globe, everywhere outside the Russian and Chinese empires. To the normal sensual man, Ford's $3-billion in assets and three hundred million a year to spend do seem, in a word, a fortune. But from the inside the financial situation had begun to look different.

"Ford, in its first 15 years," Bundy says, "could kid itself a little, talk as though it had the lever to move the world. But today the Department of Health, Education and Welfare is not an educational institution—it's a foundation. The Office of Economic Opportunity is a foundation: it's giving money to chaos, not running chaos." In terms of H.E.W. and O.E.O., the money available at Ford is not impressive. Three hundred million dollars is something like one-fourth of 1 per cent of the Federal budget, the sort of sum a White House assistant throws about easily in conversation at the Bureau of the Budget. With the growing involvement of both universities and businesses in the governmental process, the trustees, too, were suffering sober second thoughts about the adequacy of Henry Ford's legacy. "You know," says Jay Stratton, "I was on the board of the National Science Foundation. Here at Ford we spend about half the N.S.F. budget, but in many more areas. Still it's not trivial. . . ."

In every area of its work, the foundation finds itself coordinating somehow with the Federal Government. "Ford is in everything but medicine and religion," says a staff member, "the Government is now in everything but religion. We can't back away whenever the Government comes in. It's like the chambered nautilus, the public and the private are intertwined. We don't need treaties, exactly; but every year we need greater understanding between the foundations and the Government."

EVERYBODY is a little sensitive about Bundy's passage from the Government to the foundation, and anxious to make sure it is understood that no special arrangements exist. A particular worry for many of the staff was Bundy's former role as planner and defender of the American policy in Vietnam, and one of Bundy's first acts as president was to summon key members of the staff and tell them he didn't plan to use Ford's resources to make Vietnam safe for democracy, didn't want anybody to change his views (or moderate his comments) on Vietnam (or any other issue) to suit the new boss. Bundy has seen the President only a few times since leaving the White House staff. "My only relation to the Federal Government now," he says, "is that I know a number of phone numbers."

Still, the question is not quite so simply answered. Bundy still reads The Washington Post every day, and drinks cup after cup of black coffee through his meetings, in the hallowed manner of the executive branch. Though Henry Stimson was to put most of the rest of his life into the private practice of the law, Bundy wrote about his acceptance of a U.S. Attorney's post in 1906 that "he crossed forever the river that separates private citizens from public men." Bundy, too, has crossed that river. Someone idly commented that the professional deformation of people in Washington was their belief that Washington runs the country; and Bundy retorted that the professional deformation of New Yorkers was a belief that Washington doesn't run the country. His five years in Washington made a vast change in his own life chances—"If Kennedy hadn't picked him out of Harvard," Auchincloss says, "he'd be president of Yale today, and set there for the rest of his life." The change must have made differences in his attitudes, too, and in the way he will work at Ford.

APART from its administrative responsibilities (which are by no means trivial—picking the right people is the name of the game), the job of president of the Ford Foundation is fundamentally one of liaison between the staff and the trustees. As the trustees must approve all appropriations of money—and because, if the thing is run well (which it hasn't always been in the past), all applications for grants will go through the president's office—Bundy's power will be considerable.

Under Bundy's predecessors, the effective power of the office was constrained by the foundation's over-all timidity, its reluctance to become identified with the people who actually used the money. When a Blitzstein announced that he would use a Ford-financed commission to write an opera about Sacco and Vanzetti, or a Ford-sponsored study of juries bugged a jury room in Wichita, the foundation wanted to be able to say that the Metropolitan Opera, not Ford, had given Blitzstein the commission; and the University of Chicago Law School, not Ford, was responsible for the conduct of the jury study.

Now half price: one of the world's great newspapers.

Perhaps you've promised yourself you'd subscribe to The Christian Science Monitor someday. This is the perfect "someday" — do it now and you'll save half the cost. We'll send you 100 issues for only $3.93. That's about 4 months of exclusive news coverage for less than 4¢ a copy!

The Monitor is a daily newspaper that's written largely by the people on its staff. You get first-hand reporting from Monitor correspondents all over the globe. You get first-rate analysis of the news by editors who treat you as an adult.

This paper is concerned with what man is achieving, regardless of the area of achievement. The Monitor is profoundly interested in progress whether it be in politics, foreign affairs, race relations, business, finance, law enforcement, sports, travel, books, entertainment, automobiles, fashion, or even chess.

If you want award-winning news coverage of all areas of human endeavor this widely quoted newspaper is for you. You can profit from it intellectually, conversationally — perhaps even financially. And you'll look forward to its arrival like that of an understanding friend.

The Christian Science Monitor is not what you'd call a religious paper, if that's what you've been thinking. It's truly a news newspaper — for any alert person who wants the significant events of the world in sharp focus. It takes you further into the news than a local paper can. (And why wait until the end of the week to get news analysis in print.)

Our editors bring perspective to events that matter. They help relate today to both yesterday and tomorrow. But they let you do your share of the thinking. The Monitor is designed for grown-ups — but there's nothing in it, in either news or advertising, that a child shouldn't see.

(A year's subscription to The Christian Science Monitor costs $24. You can receive a special trial subscription of 100 issues for just $3.93 — less than 4¢ a copy. That's half the usual price.)

Dear Christian Science Monitor: I'm ready to try one of the world's great newspapers.

Send me 100 issues of the Monitor (6 days a week for about 4 months). I understand I pay just $3.93. That's less than 4¢ a copy — half the usual price. Thanks for the savings!

went not to specific projects but to National Educational Television. When a specific series was very much in mind, as in the Continental Classroom and Sunrise Semester films, where everyone knew the money was to be spent for courses in political science or economics, Ford still made its grants to the associations of university political scientists or economists rather than to the producers of the show: the foundation promoted ideas, not their execution.

Even where the decisions on an eventual allocation were to be made by people directly associated with Ford, responsibility was scattered by the establishment of a theoretically separate "Fund" for the Advancement of Education or for the Republic. Independent "regranting" organizations like the American Council of Learned Societies and the Social Science Research Council were made prosperous and much more useful by Ford largess, which they thereupon distributed to what they considered the most likely looking recipients.

IN the later years of the Henry Heald regime much of this safety-first attitude had disappeared. W. McNeil

Where the Money Goes

Since it began giving away money in 1936,* the Ford Foundation has distributed nearly $3-billion to more than 5,000 institutions and, through fellowships and indirectly, to many more thousands of individuals. Ninety per cent of this sum has gone to United States recipients; the rest to institutions in 78 foreign countries.

The foundation's executives (self-described "philanthropoids") invest the money in "experimental, demonstration and developmental projects" in fields as various as music and natural resources, noncommercial television and birth control. "The objective of our business," one philanthropoid said, "is to earn a good 'nonprofit'—that is, a good return for society." In the fiscal year ending this September 30, the foundation made grants totaling $341.6-million in the following fields:

	(Millions)
American education	$112.2
Art, humanities, communication	103.9
International programs (development aid in Asia, Africa, Latin America; educational programs in developed countries)	59.0
U. S. public affairs (community action, housing and minority problems, justice, economic research)	42.4
Population studies and family planning	21.6
Miscellaneous	2.5

*Established by Henry and Edsel Ford largely for Michigan charities, the foundation didn't become a national and international philanthropy until 1950.

Ode to Ford

How firm a Foundation we saints of the Lord
Have built on the faith of our excellent Ford . . .
How firm a Foundation; we've three times the dough
And ten times the brains any other can show.

—Robert Maynard Hutchins, associate director of the Ford Foundation, 1951-54, now president of The Fund for the Republic.

Lowry (who served as acting president while Bundy was being sprung from the White House) had established a Ford program in the arts on a basis of direct small grants to painters, sculptors, composers, playwrights, theater companies, ballet schools—and, finally, in a whopping grant to orchestras. Here the path of least resistance would have been to give the money to the American Symphony Orchestra League and let the league parcel it out; but Ford made up its own mind about which orchestras were the most worthy.

The brilliant and beautiful flowering of the New York City Opera has drawn energy from Lowry's green stuff, though the trustees' acquaintance includes a number of people who saw no reason why New York should have a significant second opera house. More adventurously (perhaps), Paul Ylvisaker's Public Affairs Program was allowed to be covertly as well as openly influential in the civil-rights movement, and in the end to make public grants to community-action programs of the kind most distressing to friends of the Ford trustees, and perhaps to the trustees themselves.

Still, the habit of looking at the foundation's activities as a series of dissociated "programs" had come to dominate the internal organization of the offices in the tower at 477 Madison Avenue. Bundy found that subjects of concern like the condition of the Negro American were divided between public affairs and education divisions with little liaison between the two. He expects to "build enterprises that will draw across our program lines" and for this purpose is "acting as my own vice president in domestic affairs when they are not education or humanities-and-the-arts."

In the course of this centralization, people will be moved around to areas where Bundy feels they will perform best. Frank Bowles, for example, formerly president of the College Entrance Examination Board, always an imaginative man impatient of bureaucracy and freshly returned from running a Paris-based UNESCO study of worldwide access to higher education, had been slotted as administrator of the foundation's projects in American elementary and secondary schools; Bundy last week moved him back to longer-range planning and international education. All the Vestal Virgins worry a little about such reassignments in the temple, if only because Bundy, though indubitably a Roman himself, has recently spent so much time with Barbarians.

Basically, Bundy wants Ford, which in one sense means himself, to keep tighter control over the expenditure of its resources. Even the traditional use of the learned societies as regranting groups strikes him as possibly dubious policy. "We're in the wholesale business," he says. "Perhaps we should set up a retail store, rather than giving it to Pen Herring [director of the Social Science Research Council] and having him decide. Of course, the professions like it the way it is."

The new pattern involves transforming the vice-presidential layer from the place where program directors are told "No" to the area of direct authority, and Bundy for that purpose has been using to the hilt the unrestricted appropriation in the president's office. "If you sit here looking for the useful moment to help somebody get his job done, it's easy," he says. "That accounts for the honeymoon period. My approach has been that anyone who is equipped to be a vice president of the foundation is entitled to a hundred-thousand-dollar mistake. I've been approving officer grants virtually on somebody's say-so —with perhaps a phone call to say, 'Have you thought of this?' There is a problem in that officers do get deeply concerned with making their programs work, and see the money as fuel for their gas tanks rather than as a way to find a guy with a good car."

EXCEPT for his years of passage from private to captain during World War II, Bundy prior to his Washington experience had been an academician, a professor of government with a specialty in foreign affairs, and a university administrator. Both foreign affairs and the universities were areas where the foundation was deeply committed, and it seemed likely that Bundy at least at the beginning would work from these bases of expertise. Instead, after five months of meeting people, looking around and reading, he placed his first of what will be many stamps on the foundation with major public utterances on television and on the future of the Negro American.

The television position was taken in response to an invitation from the Federal Communications Commission to "all interested parties," to present proposals on how the F.C.C. should go about its legislatively mandated job of setting up long-distance communication by satellite in the United States. The Ford proposal, which has taken more of Bundy's time than any other single piece of work moving through the foundation, argued that the F.C.C. should grant a monopoly license to a private nonprofit corporation which would devote its revenues from the transmission of network shows to the promotion of noncommercial (not just "educational") television. It came about very much at Bundy's initiative and—perhaps significantly—the people most closely associated with it were the people he brought into the foundation himself.

"The day after I left C.B.S.," says Fred Friendly, who resigned loudly as president of C.B.S. News to protest the network's failure to carry live transmission of the Senate Vietnam hearings (hearings, incidentally, which Bundy heartily disliked), "I had a phone call at 10 in the morning, from a White House operator; could I speak with Mr. Bundy? He said, 'You know I'm leaving here to be president of the Ford Foundation. We've put a hundred million dollars into educational television, and we haven't got our money's worth. Would you talk about it with me?' He came up to New York, we had dinner, talked from 7 to midnight, when I walked him back to his hotel."

The two men had met when Bundy handled the White House staff work for the all-network year-end rocking-chair interview with President Kennedy, and had worked together again on the staging of the Bundy-Hans Morgenthau debate on American Vietnam policy. Though Bundy is quintessentially cool and Friendly is an angry man, they shared a number of attitudes toward broadcasting. "There wasn't anything new," Friendly says, "about the idea that the networks should pay a tax for their franchise—Walter Lippmann suggested it years ago. But there had never been a plan. The real story here, though, isn't the action of the foundation but the reaction of the public. This was an idea like one-way streets or Negroes in baseball or birth control—not just something whose time had come, but something that was lying there waiting for anybody to pick it up."

BUNDY hired Friendly to be the foundation's Advisor on Television (the capital letters and the spelling are canonical); and he likes to talk about the Ford proposal as primarily Friendly's doing. But The Economist of London noted shrewdly that "the Ford plan bears the Bundy stamp; like a good Harvard examination question, it will force the Federal Communications Commission to think harder than it had planned to do."

Friendly, perhaps with the instinct of a television veteran, refers to it as "the Bundy plan." Bundy says that his plunge into television "was an interlocking thing: Friendly came into the employment market at the time when the F.C.C. deadline was pending. It's untypical, in a way, but it may become more typical because it's been so much fun."

Among the fun parts has been the wrestle with the Bell System, which is more than a little concerned about the relationship between satellites and its own "long lines"; during the course of the ritual openings of this struggle, Bundy became the first prominent figure in quite a while (maybe ever) to say in public that the American Telephone & Telegraph Company was "crazy."

A slightly modified and much more detailed proposal will go from Ford to the F.C.C. on Nov. 30, and Bundy has brought people into the foundation

TV THAT EDUCATES—At Hawthorne School, Jefferson County, Ky., pupils hear a Spanish teacher on television as the classroom teacher writes words on a projecting device. Closed-circuit educational TV is a major Ford project.

(most notably, the Washington lawyer David Ginsburg, who wrote the brief that supported the original submission) for the purpose of maneuvering the plan through the rather shallow governmental waters ahead. Meanwhile, he and Friendly are cooking up additional surprises, among them direct commitments to specified people doing specified programing for noncommercial broadcast, a kind of identification which the foundation has avoided in the past because of its obvious risks.

ENCOURAGING as the cheerful uproar over the television plan has been, it obscured the second part of what had been planned as a one-two punch—Bundy's speech to the annual banquet of the National Urban League, in Philadelphia, the day after the release of the proposal to the F.C.C. Here—in the area of civil rights—there was no foundation "plan." What Bundy gave was a private apology for coming in late ("For the last five years . . . my job was to work on the foreign affairs of the United States . . . the time and attention which would ordinarily spread over a wider range of current concerns were heavily focused on events beyond our shores"); a warning that at best there were limits to what he could offer in the civil-rights field ("the most important single fact about the Ford Foundation in this context is that it does not have the kind of money this problem needs").

There was also a statement of personal commitment ("Speaking for myself, as one voter, it seems to me that it is right and reasonable to suggest that the level of effort—financial and political and personal—which is here required is fully comparable to the effort we now make as a nation in Vietnam"). The last of these statements being unofficial and perhaps "political," was not reprinted in the pamphlet of excerpts from the speech published by the foundation.

In this area, Bundy seems to have concluded, somewhat reluctantly, that the foundation must work mostly by encouraging, facilitating and perhaps demonstrating programs that only the Federal Government can actually accomplish. "Perhaps we can help people more intelligently apply for and use these larger governmental philanthropic pies," he says. "Encouragement from us may give the Government the courage of its convictions. Or we can find ways through training and research to make the U.S. Government more effective.

WHITE HOUSE DAYS—Presidential aide Bundy at a Kennedy budget session in 1961. Backs to camera, Budget director David Bell (now also with the Ford Foundation) and, right, Theodore Sorensen. Far right, Elmer Staats, then deputy Budget director.

"This is an area where you can't just go and say I want Professor So-and-So. After the war [then Harvard president James Bryant] Conant and [then Carnegie Corporation president John] Gardner set up the Russian Research Center at Harvard, to train people who could work on our relations with the Soviet Union. If we'd had this sort of center to train leadership for the civil-rights movement. . . ."

BUNDY speaks a little nervously about the need for the foundation to work with groups and individuals who can make themselves great nuisances; he is willing but not eager to face what comes when Ford-sponsored projects send pickets out to embarrass governments. "Picketing," he says with a gesture of distaste, disliking the cliché but knowing nothing more satisfactory, "is better than rioting."

He has been meeting both individually and in little conferences (Chairman Stratton often by his side) with all those leaders of Negro organizations who will meet with him, partly for his own education, partly in the hope that some idea will arise from a meeting that has not already been uncovered by the large and mostly very capable staff Ford has had working on these problems for a decade. (Bundy likes to ask "Why not?" questions, but unlike most people who ask such questions, he listens to the answers.) Meanwhile, he has put most of his reading time into trying to catch up on the literature of the race problem.

The chance to do some consecutive reading has been for Bundy the great luxury of the Ford job. Not too long ago, the Presidency was a post in which, according to Mencken, Calvin Coolidge could respond to bad news "by pulling down the blinds, stretching his legs upon his desk, and snoozing away the lazy afternoons." Under Kennedy and Johnson, it has become a job that takes all day, every day, all year long; and when the President is working he likes to have his staff close at hand: the White House limousine called for Bundy just about every morning. "The office here," Bundy says, marveling at it, "closes Friday afternoon. That's a new thing for me—even at Harvard we didn't close until Saturday afternoon."

NEW YORK is all new to Bundy. "One of the reasons I took this job,"

Largess

Since 1889, when Andrew Carnegie in his "The Gospel of Wealth" urged his "dear fellow millionaires" to assign their surplus funds to public uses—preferably during their lifetime—the number of philanthropic foundations in this country has increased from a score to 17,700. Of these—according to the Foundation Library Center in New York City—215 have assets of over $10-million. Total yearly grants by all American foundations exceed $1-billion.

The top ten U. S. foundations, in size of assets, are:

	Assets (millions)
Ford Foundation	$3,033
Rockefeller Foundation	854
Duke Endowment	692
Kellogg (W. K.) Foundation	492
Mott (C. S.) Foundation	418
Carnegie Corporation of New York	344
Hartford (J. A.) Foundation	342
Lilly Endowment	319
Sloan (A. P.) Foundation	309
Pew Memorial Trust	273

he says, "is the simple proposition that Mary and I wanted to live in New York for a while." On his desk is a copy of "The New York Times Guide to Dining Out in New York," and he daily receives recommendations from his staff (often astonishingly bad recommendations) about where to eat in this city. During his first half-year at Ford, however, he took his leisure time away from the city: "Mary and I made a long postponed trip to Japan, for our last chance to see it under the guiding eye of Ed Reischauer [until recently U.S. Ambassador to Japan; now back at Harvard, whence he came]; we took a trip to the Caribbean, took two of the children to Europe."

Being president of the Ford Foundation involves a certain devotion of social hours to duty (U.N.-type affairs, opening nights at the Met, etc.) —and being a Bundy does mean a certain amount of more conventional social obligation. His brother is in Washington, but he has a sister, Mrs. Hugh Auchincloss, who lives busily in suburban New Jersey. For the rest, Bundy has been more likely to spend time with old friends from Washington than with new friends here. Mostly, he says, "I've been seeing my family."

Ford's limousine calls for Bundy at his East Side apartment five mornings a week at 8:15, which gets him to the office at 8:30. "Traffic's not bad at that hour. Then I sort out the desk, which is what was there last night less what I did at home. I like to keep the first half of the morning clear—I don't succeed—for reading and thinking. Then I'm on the phone around the staff. I do the committee meetings and that sort of thing in the afternoon, which is not so good a time for starting out your own thoughts, but it's fine for committee meetings.

"Quite often I have a semi-business lunch. Last week there was one with Devereux Josephs to find out about Channel 13 from its board's point of view, one with Ham Armstrong to talk about a hypothetical article for Foreign Affairs, one with a program director here about some changes I think should be made in his program, that I'd rather have him hear from me than read in a memorandum. There are always a few protocol meetings, with people who have the right to be turned down by the front office.

"Most of the time goes into planning changes in day-to-day affairs, and the need to keep a large staff of professionals fully informed. I'm still learning about the foundation. If there's some reason to leave early, if we're eating with the children, I'll leave at 5:30. Otherwise it's 6:30 or 7. One of the trustees said to me that this was a job that couldn't be done well more than half time. It hasn't worked out quite that way, but in hours it's a lot easier here than it was in Washington."

What seems a mild regimen to Bundy looks severe to some of his new subordinates. The switchboard is open later, 5:30 has become a normal time for a meeting to start, and a "task-force" approach, with scheduled target dates, is beginning to replace the more leisurely practice of individual responsibility for individual programs. During the last week of shaping the proposal for the F.C.C., the television task force worked practically round the clock, with Saturday and Sunday in the office. ("You should have seen the look on the faces of the porters," says Fred Friendly; "nobody'd ever been in those offices at that time before.")

Intellectually, Bundy is pretty fierce: he expects people to say what they have to say clearly enough so that he can stay one step ahead of them. "What we have around here these days," says one of the staff, "is a think tank in five-minute takes."

BUNDY is a compact, youthful, graceful man with thinning blond hair and two facial expressions: a rather fixed smile while listening, and an individual frown, the skin wrinkled over the bridge of the glasses in an Etruscan design, on the relatively few occasions when he has to ponder a reply. An older man not connected with the foundation, who has watched Bundy since he was in his early 20's, worries a little about his obvious confidence. "Mac is still guided," he says, "by attitudes he hasn't penetrated yet. He's always been close to the throne, not up against equals. When you're in a competitive job, up against the grit—that makes you tend to develop wisdom as distinct from just mental capacity."

As against that concern, McCloy, who has known Bundy equally long, sees him as "a highly articulate, able fellow; a doer, he keeps his desk moving; he's assertive, ambitious, with a sense of his own strength and a desire to exercise it." Highly self-conscious, Bundy is fighting not to exercise his strength prematurely. "The danger around here," he says, "is that you'll give in to the temptation to shoot at a target of immediate opportunity."

Bundy has already made certain adjustments to the job. The picture on the side table is still that of Henry Stimson, but beside it now are the three television sets that adorn the office of every major broadcasting executive (many of the television magnates, however, leave them running, with the sound off; Bundy leaves them dark). The level of urgency is different from what it was in the White House ("These are important matters," says a staff man, "but they're not the Cuban missile crisis"). The political context is different. "This situation," says Jay Stratton, "is peculiar to a foundation: to what extent is the staff officer merely a passive agent for somebody else's ideas, and to what extent does he impose his will on the recipient by virtue of his resources? I have lived," Stratton adds, "on the other side, too." And the time scale has to be longer: "The key here," Bundy says, "is to do things the society is going to want after it has them."

Meanwhile, Bundy is educating himself. "Somebody said," he recalls, "'If you want to know what goes on in the real world, the Ford Foundation is the best place to learn.' That's one of the reasons I was interested in the job. It may be that nobody tells the truth to a foundation; but everybody tells part of the truth. You get an interesting variety of people who come talk to you."

When this process is completed, the former professor of government will start educating others—whether they like it or not. "He will be," says Chairman Jay Stratton, cheerfully if not wholly comfortably, "a very stimulating influence." ■

Ford Fund Grants Will Help Negroes Advance in Industry

FOUNDATIONS
NYT 12/9/66

The Ford Foundation announced yesterday a series of grants to help Negroes play a larger part in the nation's economy, both in small business and major industry.

The Potomac Institute in Washington will receive $246,000 to demonstrate professional counseling for small-business men in a Negro community, probably in the Baltimore area.

Three Middle Western universities—Washington, Indiana and Wisconsin — will receive $300,000, to be matched by industry, for the recruiting and training of up to 100 Negroes yearly for a master's degree in business administration and to prepare more Negroes for expanding executive openings in industry.

Other grants announced by the Ford Foundation yesterday included the following recipients:

¶The Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith—$35,000 for the preparation and publication of its Research Annual on Intergroup Relations for the next two years. The manual gives digests of research in ethnic, racial and religious interaction.

¶The University of California at Berkeley—$110,000 for the demonstration and development of a master of engineering program in design. Under the program, graduate students will gather information on engineering problems in industry.

¶Columbia University — $135,200 to make a comprehensive reassessment of American mores and translate the results into school, college and continuing-education teaching.

The University of California at Los Angeles was granted $20,000 and the University of Michigan $80,000 for a joint program of faculty attendance at engineering conferences over three years.

REPORT TO THE NEW WORLD FOUNDATION ON SOUTHERN SCHOOL DESEGREGATION CONFERENCES, 1966

Conferences on school desegregation were held, as proposed, in eight southern states and the border state of Maryland under the sponsorship of each state's Advisory Committee to the U. S. Civil Rights Commission. Following each of these, except the one in Maryland, a brief after-meeting was held to discuss the problems of achieving desegregation and to give practical guidance to Negro community leaders on the processes necessary. Such a meeting was also held in Tallahassee, for North Florida, although there was no Civil Rights Commission conference there. These meetings were sponsored jointly by the Southern Regional Council, the American Friends Service Committee, the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund, the human relations councils of the several states and civil rights groups active in each.

Schedule and Attendance

The Louisiana conference was on March 26 at the Bentley Hotel, Alexandria. Approximately 1,000 people attended the conference and about 400 were at the after-meeting.

In South Carolina, April 2, at Dreher High School, Columbia, there were 800 at the conference, 250 at the second meeting.

The Virginia conference on April 9 was at John Marshall High School in Richmond and was attended by about 600. 200 remained for the after-meeting.

An estimated 1,200 people turned out for the Mississippi conference at the Heidelberg Hotel in Jackson on April 16. At least 450 stayed for the community organization meeting.

The North Carolina conference was at the University's Greensboro campus on April 30. Some 600 people attended, with about 150 at the second session.

On May 7 the Arkansas Conference was held at Philander Smith College, Little Rock. About 550 attended, with 200 staying for the after-meeting.

The Georgia Conference was held in Atlanta, at the Biltmore Hotel, on May 14. Approximately 700 were at the main meeting and about 250 at the second meeting.

The Alabama Conference was on June 11 at the Dinkler-Tutwiler Hotel in Birmingham. About 1,200 attended, with some 500 staying for the second meeting.

On April 23, while the U. S. Civil Rights Commission staff was engaged in the Maryland Conference, a small meeting was held for Negro parents and leaders in Tallahassee. About 70 people attended. The American Friends Service Committee, assisted by a staff member of the Florida Council on Human Relations, planned that extra conference, and the Southern Regional Council paid some travel expenses for participants.

The Programs

The conferences followed very similar patterns. Copies of the schedules for two of them are attached. It can be seen that the same basic program was used for both, and it was used for the others also. Speakers and other leaders varied, of course.

The organization meetings were also much alike. Ordinarily the entire group stayed together for a briefing, usually by Miss Jean Fairfax of the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund or a member of the American Friedds Service Committee staff (which has been working intensively on school desegregation for a number of years). This briefing included the key points of the new guidelines, techniques of organization to secure transfers to formerly all-white schools, dodges to watch for, etc. There was also time for specific case-problems and questions and answers.

By April 30, when the North Carolina Conference was held, the transfer period was supposed to have been over. There was an extension. Nevertheless, the after-meetings of the last four conferences dealt more with what happened - instances of guidelines violations, difficulties, and the like - than with organization and planning. There was wide-spread frustration and an often-expressed feeling that "freedom of choice" plans would never do away with the dual school systems.

The Response

Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, and South Carolina had the largest attendances and, as it seemed, the greatest interest. This was no doubt due to the fact that these are the states in which there has been least progress toward school desegregation and most frustration. (The attendance in Georgia was a little smaller than in the other Deep South states. Georgia and Alabama had had good conferences on school desegregation a couple of months before -- and Georgia did not have the widely-publicized, total opposition of the state administration to the guidelines that Alabama had.)

In Louisiana, where only six parishes had "voluntary" desegregation plans and five times as many were under court order, the interest was remarkable. There was little organization in Louisiana, the civil rights groups not having concentrated on that state, and the people seemed to feel the need keenly.

The Mississippi and Alabama Conferences had the added attraction of an address by Commissioner Howe himself. The challenging circumstances and considerable civil rights leadership also contributed to the greater interest shown.

However, the response in Arkansas, Georgia, North Carolina, and Virginia was not at all disappointing.

Costs

A statement showing expenditures for transportation state by state is attached.

Virtually all of the money expended from the New World Foundation grant was for transportation expenses of participants. Since most of the experts used were either from government agencies or the staffs of private organizations, only one or two consultants had to be utilized. Thus there was less expense for this purpose than we anticipated.

In addition, there was general agreement among representatives of the sponsoring agencies that we should not try to pay the entire cost of operating a car to the conference, but only the cost of gasoline and oil. At the first conference, Louisiana, we paid drivers at the rate of six cents per mile. We noted that many who collected were school principals, teachers and others who were not in the low-income group. Subsequently we reimbursed drivers at the rate of three cents per mile, which we calculated to be enough to buy gasoline and oil for the trip. (Except that in Virginia werwere already committed, by a letter of invitation to the after-meeting, to six-cents per mile.)

Evaluation

We feel that the conferences and after-meetings were very valuable and that the provision for participation by the poor greatly increased the value.

At all of the conferences a large number of counties were represented. (See attached partial listings of participants in the community organization meetings.) As a result information about the regulations, the rights of minority-group pupils, the specific steps required of school boards (including copies of required letters and forms), and the techniques of organization for school desegregation was widely disseminated. The staff of the Civil Rights Commission provided literally tons of government publications -- and they were taken eagerly by participants. Sponsors of the second sessions provided kits of material on organization to secure transfers and to monitor procedures of the local school board.

A second value of the conference was that they gave people opportunity to see, perhaps to meet, employees of government and private agencies who could be called upon for assistance. We feel that it was encouraging to community leaders to see what and who was available to help.

We also think that it was valuable for government officials to be confronted with people from remote counties and with their fears and difficulties concerning school desegregation.

The conferences provided a platform for reaffirmation by government officials of the validity of the guidelines and the determination of the administration to achieve desegregation. Commissioner Howe's speeches in Mississippi and Alabama, for example, were widely publicized. This kind of thing was valuable at a time when governors and senators and school officials from these states were publicly decrying the guidelines as illegal and calling for resistance to them.

NEGRO CONVICTED OF KILLING WHITE

GEORGIA

Mercy Is Recommended by Interracial Georgia Jury

3/4/66

AMERICUS, Ga., March 3 (UPI) — A jury of 10 whites and two Negroes convicted a 23-year-old Negro today of fatally shooting a white marine recruit during a tense racial demonstration last summer.

The Sumter County Superior Court panel spared the life of the admitted slayer, Charles Lee Hopkins, by recommending mercy. A prison sentence for life is now mandatory.

Hopkins is one of two Negroes charged with the slaying on July 28 of Andrew Whatley, 21, who had been accepted into the Marine Corps, but not yet inducted, just before his death.

Mr. Whatley was shot to death while standing on a street corner two blocks from the local courthouse, where Negroes were staging an all-night prayer vigil.

Hopkins, the only witness for the defense, confessed in a quavering voice that he had blindly fired a pistol into a white crowd, which he said was throwing objects at cars occupied by Negroes and yelling: "Nigger, nigger, we are going to kill you."

The confession was in the form of an unsworn statement.

Hopkins contended that he had fired blindly and "did not intend to kill anybody."

But the prosecutor, Solicitor General J. Frank Myers characterized the slaying as "wanton murder without regard for life" and asked that Hopkins be sent to the electric chair.

The jury, which took three days to hear the case, arrived at its verdict after 65 minutes.

Mrs. Lyda Whatley, mother of the slain white youth, lost some of the stony-faced composure with which she has viewed the trial and wiped tears from her eyes while the events leading to the slaying were reviewed.

Hopkins said he and a friend, 22-year-old Eddie James Lamar — who is to be tried later for Mr. Whatley's death — were on their way home when they saw the whites yelling and throwing objects at Negroes. As their car passed the group, Hopkins said he thought he heard a shot.

The young Negro said he had crouched down on the back floor of the car and began firing his pistol blindly.

Their car was wrecked later and Hopkins fled on foot. Lamar surrendered immediately and Hopkins surrendered later.

The Americus Crisis Viewed 6 Months Later

By WALKER LUNDY
Atlanta Journal Staff Writer

AMERICUS, Ga., March 9 —An uneventful half year has shuffled past this easy-moving South Georgia farm town since racial fever between whites and blacks boiled into national view last summer.

Today, the town is back to "normal." The two races have made a wary uneasy peace. Life is going on almost as it did before.

But rumblings of trouble for the coming summer leak from the ramshackle Negro homes around Ashby Street. Life is slow paced on Ashby Street and summer is too far off for most people to worry just yet.

The trials last week of two young Negroes who shot down a white youth during a racial demonstration last July attracted only mild attention among the whites. And most local people of both races were satisfied with the verdict of the jury, on which two Negroes served.

One defendant, the alleged trigger man, received a life sentence and the other one, who drove the car, was given five years.

THE TRIALS were a post script to a strife-ridden "long hot summer" that saw Negroes by the hundreds march 30 times in three weeks from rickety wooden Friendship Baptist Church down Cotton Avenue to the modern Sumter County Courthouse for rallies protesting segregation.

It had been during one of these that a car carrying two Negroes had sped out of the night and Andy Whatley had fallen on a downtown street corner mortally wounded by a bullet in the head.

The next day, Gov. Sanders ordered more than 100 club-carrying state troopers into the city to keep separated the angry whites and marching Negroes. The number of gun permits issued tripled.

The city was in crisis.

But seven months have passed since the Whatley youth's funeral. The Southern Christian Leadership Conference and Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee people, the "outside agitators," have gone and the local Negroes who led the "Sumter County Movement" are biding their time.

Has the lot of the Americus Negro improved since the racial fires of last summer? Is he getting fair treatment from a group he candidly refers to as the "white power structure" of the community?

THE ANSWERS DEPEND upon who is being interviewed.

"We're working at it hard and we're doing the best we can," says Mayor T. Griffin Walker, a major target of much of the Negro complaining last summer.

"The demonstrations — without any doubt — set the relationship between the races back a good ways. But some of us have diligently been working to improve it and some very definite progress has been made," says Dr. R. A. Collins, a section leader of the powerful John Birch Society.

Most whites would agree.

The Negroes, however, present a different side.

"Americus is the same as it was last summer," says Rev. R. L. Campbell, president of the Sumter County Movement, the local organization that led the protest.

The Negroes have made certain gains although two of their key goals from last summer have remained unfulfilled.

One demand was that a biracial committee be established to open lines of communication between the races. Although the City Council has said the Negroes may appear before them to state their grievances anytime, no biracial group has been set up.

Another demand was for the county voting registrar to open his office a half-day on Saturday and at least one week night to make it easier for working Negroes to register to vote. The hours, 9 a.m.-noon and 2-5 p.m. Monday through Friday, have remained the same.

Says the Rev. Mr. Campbell: "We talk to them (the city fathers) but that's all we do, talk. They never promise us anything."

The city, however, did hire two Negro policemen after the demonstrations, which was a minor demand of the Movement. But the Negroes are unhappy with the city's choices. They say the Negro policemen are rougher with them than the white policemen.

Integration in the city is mostly just on paper for a variety of reasons.

The town's only movie theater has become integrated. But most of the Negroes sit in the balcony because they can't afford the more expensive downstairs seats where the whites sit.

DOWNTOWN BUSINESSES have been very slow in hiring Negroes except for jobs that require dust rags or brooms. One Negro works as a clerk in a clothing store but she was there before the demonstrations last summer.

The restrooms in the courthouse are still usually off limits to Negroes. During the trials last week, which were well attended by Negroes, the restrooms were kept locked much of the time. Once, when they were not and a Negro man tried to use one, a white man stepped in front of him and told him to stay away. The Negro turned away peacefully.

All three areas, the movie theater, downtown jobs equal with the whites and the courthouse restrooms, have been crisis points of racial disturbances at one time or another.

But an uneasy truce prevails there and in the other areas where Negroes are not happy with the white man's treatment.

The streets of Americus are clear of marching Negroes. But the city's racial sores are far from being healed.

"They're wrong if they think they are," says the Rev. Mr. Campbell referring to the community's white leaders. "If them people don't open up, we're gonna throw our bodies back in the streets."

He names the summer as a likely date.

Why not now?

"We aren't satisfied now but we got to rest. I'm so tired of it. The majority of the adults — the old people — is very tired," the Negro said, emphasizing the word "very."

"But the young people — the ones who are gonna have to live in Americus tomorrow when we're gone — they tell me every day they're not tired. They're just waiting for school to close," he said.

It was the young people who provided the bulk of the marchers last summer and who followed the leadership of the Movement and the leadership of the outside civil rights groups.

The Rev. Mr. Campbell said the major problem facing Americus Negroes today is still employment. They can't get good jobs, he says.

"That's just not true," said Dr. Collins. "Local industry is hiring without discrimination. But the white community is not going to give any dole outs."

The Rev. Mr. Campbell said, "A man told me the other day. He said, 'Reverend, I've got jobs open but it's nothing Negroes can do.' You know what it was? Driving a cold drink truck."

Most of the Negroes believe the white business community would like to break down more but are afraid of certain other whites, principally those belonging to or associating with the local Birch chapters.

SUMTER COUNTY is a stronghold of the John Birch Society. Several hundred in the county belong to one of several chapters that meet regularly.

The Americus Negro should not fear the Birch Society, Dr. Collins says.

"A large number of people here are trying to reach the Negroes. That is the role of the Birch Society, regardless of what the liberal press says. We even considered trying to form a sort of biracial committee of our own," the doctor says.

He explains how the idea got started that the Birchers were anti-Negro: "We just took a hard view when they marched up and down the streets last summer. We didn't think we should reward them for civil disobedience."

The local John Birchites tried last fall to organize a Negro chapter but could not.

"I think they were just afraid of the other civil rights Negroes," Dr. Collins says. "I think that's the only reason some of them didn't want to join."

He explains that he is "not at liberty to say" if there are any Negro members now in the local Birch organization.

Dr. Collins disagrees with the Rev. Mr. Campbell that trouble between the races is brewing for the coming summer. Other whites are divided.

"I just don't know what will happen," said one, "but I'm worried."

"It's gonna blow up just like it did last time, maybe," the Rev. Mr. Campbell predicts.

"I doubt if they're gonna try that stuff again in Americus" counters Dr. Collins. "If they do, they'll just wind up farther back than they are now."

East Point Law Aims At Rights Agitators

AJ 3/10/66

By DAVID NORDAN

East Point City Council has passed an ordinance aimed at "civil rights agitators," declaring that anyone not a resident of East Point who enters the city for the "sole purpose of breaking its laws or counseling anyone else to do so" will be subject to a fine and a term on the city's public works force.

Under the ordinance, conviction can bring from 30 to 90 days on the public works force and a fine of from $300 to $1,000.

The law says nothing about commission of the crime being necessary for conviction.

An official said he doubts that it will hold up in court, but it will provide the city's policemen with some protection if they are ever faced with the problem of handling demonstrators.

THE COUNCIL unanimously passed the ordinance on its first reading during a regular meeting this week.

200 Negro Pupils March In Crisp School Protest

AC 3/29/66 GEORGIA

CORDELE, Ga. (AP)—Negro pupils staged two demonstrations Monday protesting what they called poor conditions in the schools in Crisp County.

About 200 were in the morning demonstration, and police said there were no incidents as they marched to the courthouse offices of School Supt. James Y. Moultrie Jr.

The pupils stood in front of the building, sang and then departed.

About 100 returned in the afternoon. They were accompanied by two young white men wearing beards.

Five policemen stood across the street. They included two Negro policemen. Once, an officer cautioned the group of demonstrators to keep moving. They walked around the courthouse, through an outside corridor, and later departed, still singing and chanting.

Schools in Crisp County were integrated for the first time last fall. Under a freedom-of-choice plan, seven Negroes applied to attend white schools. Five were accepted.

Civil rights leaders said the demonstration was in protest of rundown conditions at one of the schools.

U.S. Still Undecided On Penn Case Action

GEORGIA AJ 3/29/66

By The Associated Press

A federal attorney in Macon, Ga., says if an indictment on conspiracy charges against six white men is reinstated in the 1964 highway slaying of Negro educator Lemuel A. Penn, it will be a mandate to present the case in court.

This means the federal government could proceed in June with a case against the six, all from Athens, Ga. The U.S. Supreme Court left it up to federal prosecutors Monday by reversing U.S. District Judge William A. Bootle's dismissal of federal charges growing out of the slaying of the Washington educator.

The Department of Justice says it has not yet made a decision on the case.

Penn was shot to death 23 miles northeast of Athens on July 11, 1964, as he and two other Negro men were driving back to Washington after Army Reserve training.

The six men, who had been charged with conspiring to "injure, oppress, threaten and intimidate Negro citizens," have been identified by the FBI as active in Ku Klux Klan affairs.

ON OTHER race fronts, at Oak Ridge, Tenn., a new barber shop scheduled to open April 12 will be guaranteed financial support in an attempt to break down segregation barriers at established shops.

The atomic city's Community Relations Council, a citizen group formed 10 years ago, has collected $3,000 of a $10,000 goal it has set to assure the new barbers a minimum income for one year.

The campaign started after a proposed public accommodations ordinance aimed at barber and beauty shops failed in City Council.

Also, Undersecretary of Commerce LeRoy Collins said Negro education is not keeping pace with new job opportunities for Negro men and women. He said predominantly Negro colleges provide the way stations for thousands of young Negroes who have no other opportunity for higher education.

Collins and McGrath were among speakers at a convocation of the United Negro College Fund in Washington.

IN CORDELE, GA., where five Negro pupils entered previously all-white schools last year, two protest marches were staged by young Negroes Monday to the office of the county school superintendent. About 200 pupils conducted a brief morning march and about 100 showed up during the afternoon, singing and marching through the Crisp County Courthouse. Civil rights groups said the pupils were protesting rundown conditions at schools.

Ten more North Carolina counties will be placed under restrictions of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, according to the U.S. Census Bureau, because fewer than 50 per cent of the voting age population cast ballots in 1964. Four other counties were informed earlier they fell below the 50 per cent figure.

Negroes and Whites Scuffle During Cordele School March

AC 3/31/66

CORDELE, Ga. (AP) — Brief shoving and scuffling occurred Wednesday between Negro and white demonstrators and police officers during a march protesting school facilities.

No one was injured and no arrests were made during an hour-long march by about 250 demonstrators, mostly Negro.

The group was marching in front of a business establishment when the proprietor asked them to leave. They left, but returned shortly and a brief shoving incident developed when the marchers refused to leave.

Wednesday was the third day demonstrators have marched on the Crisp County courthouse to protest to County School Superintendent James Y. Moultrie Jr. what they called shabby school facilities.

All of the city's policemen and deputies from the sheriff's office were sent to the courthouse.

Civil rights leaders said the pupils are protesting rundown schools including lack of hot water in restrooms, a lack of band instruments, overcrowding, inadequate heating and too few teachers.

Moultrie said the County Board of Education recognized that one of the schools, the Southview Junior High School, is in rundown condition but that the board plans to renovate it during the summer.

He also said that there is no hot water in some white schools in the county and that the county board was in the process of taking bids for new band instruments prior to the demonstrations.

Five Negro pupils were accepted under freedom of choice plans last fall when white schools were integrated in the county.

The superintendent said a half dozen persons outside of the county "are stirring up this agitation."

Moultrie met briefly with the demonstrators in his office Tuesday but when hundreds of them came into the courthouse he ended the meeting.

Governor Calls Act 'Disgusting'

AJ 7/1/66 GEORGIA

Gov. Sanders Friday ordered state troopers into Cordele where Negro demonstrators pulled United States and Georgia flags from the lanyard on the courthouse lawn.

He said he was taking this action "to guarantee that there will be no repetition of yesterday's disgusting spectacle and to assist local authorities in determining charges against those who are responsible for this outrageous act."

Lt. Gov. Peter Zack Geer Friday sent a telegram to Sol. Gen. Harvey L. Jay and Crisp County Sheriff Earle E. Posey in Cordele urging them to prosecute the offenders against the flags of the state and United States.

"This conduct not only is criminal, it is reprehensible and totally devoid of patriotism," he said.

"Any person who would mutilate the flag of his state or country is not entitled to legal rights and privileges — he deserves to be in the state penitentiary or in a public works camp."

MEANWHILE, a new American flag and a faded Georgia flag snapped in the breeze from the bent flagstaff Friday.

Sheriff Posey said resentment had cooled somewhat since Thursday when the flag pulling brought an angry outcry from white onlookers.

Col. Lowell Conner, state director of public safety, said about 30 troopers have been alerted in addition to the nine normally stationed at Cordele. He said they are prepared to move in at a moment's notice.

The city, with a population of 11,500, has a 15-man police force.

"The tearing down of the flag was an error of sorts," said George Pearson, 28, of New York, a white volunteer with the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee. Standing in the dusty yard of a dilapidated frame Negro church, he was surrounded by a group of Negro pupils.

"The intention was to tear down the Georgia state flag," said Mr. Pearson. "When it came down and was unhooked, by then the crowd was so big no one could prevent them from taking the American flag."

MR. PEARSON said the Negroes justified the desecration of the Georgia flag on the grounds that it consists largely of a Confederate standard with a blue field on the left end of it.

While Mr. Pearson was talking, a Negro man wearing a hat and dark glasses walked up and said, "We are going to march if we get killed." But he drove away immediately.

Gov. Sanders issued this statement about the Cordele flag-ripping incident:

"I am appalled by the irresponsible action of those demonstrators who have desecrated our flags. In my judgment there is no greater outrage that can be perpetrated against our nation and our flag.

"I have often pledged my allegiance to the flag and I repledge it now. And I further pledge that the flags of the United States of America and of the State of Georgia will be protected from those who would destroy them.

"Anyone who attacks the flags of our nation and our state should in my belief be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law. . . ."

LOCAL POLICE swore out warrants against four Negroes on a state charge of desecrating the U.S. flag and made one arrest. Ramona Lockett, a Negro woman in her early 20s, was taken into custody.

Police said they also charged Ulysses Fullwood, a local integration leader, but were unable to find him. They declined to reveal the names of the other two but said they were having trouble locating them.

Shortly before noon Negroes began gathering in a church to prepare for a march similar to Thursday's.

It was the fourth day of marches protesting what Negro leaders call shabby schools. The focal point of the marches has been the Crisp County Courthouse. The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee is supporting the protestors .

A Negro man recovered the American flag from the two youths who were struggling with it and handed it to a policeman.

About 15 city policemen, the sheriff and two deputies watched the activity. After the flag incident, a police officer told the Negroes to calm down or leave. Then, about eight state patrolmen arrived and ordered the Negroes off the lawn and directed the white crowd to leave. Both groups dispersed.

EARLIER, county School Supt. James Y. Moultrie Jr. said he had notified Negro parents that school renovations sought in recent demonstrations had been planned for this summer.

Moultrie said the demands by Negroes include the closing of one school, better heating systems and textbooks at a high school and a larger lunchroom at an elementary school.

No arrests were made when the flags were pulled down Thursday, he said, because it was considered wiser at the time.

Police said they later went to a house where those who took part in the desecration were staying. They said they stopped in front of the house, and the suspected persons escaped by the back door.

The flags were pulled down at the climax of a wild demonstration by about 200 Negro youths. A demonstrator shook the Georgia flag in the face of policemen, and holes were torn in the American flag as two demonstrators tugged on the banner.

CORDELE, Ga. (AP) — Calvin Craig, Georgia grand dragon of the United Klans of America, warned officials in this south Georgia town Sunday that Southern Klansmen intend to see that the American flag is "protected from perverts and niggers."

Craig, a husky, brown-haired Klan leader from Atlanta, spoke to a crowd of about 300 whites in front of the Crisp County Courthouse near where a group of mostly Negro demonstrators ripped down Georgia and U.S. flags from a pole last Thursday.

About 25 robed Klansmen stood with Craig as he spoke from a sidewalk and aimed remarks at city and county officials.

Several persons in the crowd cheered Craig's remarks.

While Craig and others spoke, a new state flag sent to Cordele by Gov. Carl E. Sanders flapped from the flagpole beneath a new American flag which a city official said was sent from nearby Tifton.

Later, Craig led his robed followers and about 250 persons on a silent, eight-block march through Cordele. There were no incidents. City police rerouted traffic around the marchers.

Meanwhile, Crisp County Sheriff Earlie E. Posey said Sunday two demonstrators arrested Saturday in connection with the flag-tearing incident have identified themselves to authorities.

He said a man who previously identified himself to newsmen as George Pearson, 28, has told authorities his name is Sith Weeks. Weeks said he is a volunteer worker for the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee from New York.

The other person arrested gave his name Sunday as Joseph York Stetson, 25, of Woodstock, Vt.

Posey said they were charged with conspiracy to deface a U.S. flag.

A total of six persons have been charged in connection with last Thursday's rowdy demonstration at the courthouse, which grew out of Negro protests of conditions in several schools.

Negro leaders called off all demonstrations until Monday, but a group of about 25 SNCC workers met Sunday afternoon in a church.

Tombs Of the Past

This is a Southern story, based on an event in one state. Included in it are some of the effects of reapportionment and the agricultural revolution.

Dr. Duncan McRae, of Telfair County, Georgia, was discussing consolidation with adjoining Wheeler County. Dr. McRae is a well established physician in the county seat. His family name is that of the county seat. In Wheeler County Commissioner Wallace Adams, banker, farmer, and businessman, has joined in the request.

Neither commissioner is a politician. Each entered politics in an effort to try and stem the downward drift of their home counties. Telfair is an old county, dating to 1807. A generation ago it was nationally known as the home of the late Eugene (Old Gene) Talmadge. He was three times governor of the state. Wheeler is new. It dates from 1912. At about the turn of the century there was a rush to establish new counties in all the rural South. Some few met a need. Others merely gratified a political clique and gave them a county to "run."

More Counties

Georgia has more counties than any state save Texas — a total of 159. More than a hundred of these counties are losing population. Of these, perhaps 60 or 80 are in, or near, a desperate financial condition. Their schools deteriorate. The county services are few and largely inefficient. Empty stores along the main street testify to the business decline. Cotton, once the backbone of the economy, diminishes more Empty stores along the main street testify to the business decline. Cotton, once the backbone of the economy, diminishes more rapidly than the population.

Telfair and Wheeler are not in the deeply depressed list of counties. Both, however, are losing population as the agricultural revolution continues.

Politics, once a very hot occupation and subject, is in an almost somnolent state now that reapportionment has given the state a more equitable but still out-of-balance system of representation. Georgia's outrageous county unit system, which enabled small, sparsely populated counties to elect a governor, congressman or U.S. senator, even though the candidate was badly behind on popular votes, was declared unconstitutional. This decision has contributed to the tomb-like quality of many courthouses.

Cotton States

In all the old cotton states there are signs of the sickness that began with the boll weevil in the 1920s. Cotton began moving westward. For a time, the small farms hung on. But they, too, are going fast. In only a few counties are there a Dr. McRae or a Wallace Adams. In most of the ailing counties the old courthouse crowd holds fast to the past, waiting for something to turn up. Except for federal farm price supports, federal highways and other benefits from Washington, they would be out of business. But they hang on, blaming all their woes on Washington.

Many of the sick Southern county seats could be rehabilitated. Consolidation of counties after thorough rigid planning will help. This would include an honest approach to schools and education and a knowledge of resources, manpower and skills.

Some years ago Connecticut abolished all her counties. The result has been good. Government is more efficient and flexible. A general overhaul in all states is indicated.

Georgia would do well to reduce her 159 counties to 10, making each congressional district a county. Good roads and immediate communications long ago removed any reason for the existence of a great many county seats. They have become symbolic tombs of the old days —where nothing happens.

Computers Once Deleted Negroes Asking State Jobs

Negro applicants for certain state government jobs i Georgia once were screened by a special code and a co puter, but the practice was abandoned recently.

A state merit system division director said Wednesday th IBM computers were programmed to delete Negroes fro lists of certified applicants when state agencies requested it.

He said he racial factor was removed from the compute process around the middle of 1965.

John Bentley, chief of the Personnel Transactions Division of the merit system, said until that time departments seeking employes were given a segregated list of applicants if they asked for it.

A memorandum to agency personnel on Feb. 24, 1965, included directions for the special code which could be inserted into the computer. The race factor was listed under the heading of "special qualifications."

Panel Again Votes To Deny Bond Seat

GEORGIA

AC 5/23/66

By WAYNE KELLEY

The House Rules Committee voted "unanimously" Monday to deny Julian Bond a seat in the state legislature for the second time in four months.

The action by 21 committee members prevents the 26-year-old Negro from taking the oath of office for Fulton County's 136th District seat.

Mr. Bond announced immemediately after the committee rendered its verdict that he will be a candidate for the legislative post a third time in September.

"I'm going to try to raise the money to qualify to run for re-election," he said.

He will have opposition from Malcolm J. Dean, the dean of men of Atlanta University, whom Mr. Bond defeated for the post last summer.

MR. BOND said he understood that Mr. Dean would oppose him in the Democratic primary this time out, rather than as a Republican.

The youthful Negro said after the committee decision that his hearing was "as fair as one might expect."

He told the Rules Committee Monday morning his anti-Viet Nam war views "have been strengthened, if anything" since Jan. 10, when the House denied him his seat by a whopping 184-12 vote.

"Just as they hoped I had changed my views, I had hoped they had changed their mind," Mr. Bond commented. "I guess we were both wrong."

The House voted against seating Mr. Bond after he endorsed a statement denouncing U.S. military involvement in Viet Nam as "murder" and aggression. He also said he admired the courage of anyone who burned his draft card, though he would not burn his own.

Mr. Bond ran unopposed in a February election after the House refused to seat him. This election was challenged by Reps. Jones Lane of Statesboro and William B. Steis of Hamilton.

The House Rules Committee heard more than an hour of testimony Monday before retiring in executive session to vote on whether Mr. Bond should be allowed to take the oath of office this time around.

REPRESENTING the would-be legislator were attorneys Howard Moore of Atlanta and Leonard Boudin of New York. Mr. Boudin and an associate, Victor Rabinowitz, once represented Fidel Castro.

Former state rep. Denmark Groover, attorney for Rep. Lane, questioned Mr. Bond closely about his present attitudes on the Viet Nam struggle. Mr. Groover asked if Mr. Bond's opinions changed.

"They would have been strengthened if there was any change," Mr. Bond replied.

HE SAID under examination that he had given about eight speeches in cities across the nation since his battle for the House seat in January. Mr. Bond conceded that he has said he "would be interested" in seeing a Negro test the draft laws, contending that Negroes are not accorded full citizenship rights and should not be compelled to serve in the armed forces.

Asked by Mr. Groover if he would go to jail rather than be drafted, Mr. Bond replied that "in all situations in which I find myself, I will obey my conscience."

50 Troopers Race to Cordele As Negroes Roam and Stone

AC 6/27/66

From Press Dispatches

CORDELE, Ga. — The State Patrol speeded 20 troopers into this south Georgia city Sunday night after bands of Negroes roamed through the streets tossing rocks, bottles and bricks. Officials said several persons were slightly injured.

State troopers from Tifton, Americus and Perry were sent to aid local police and troopers.

A crowd of white persons had gathered in the afternoon, but at 11 p.m. Patrol Lt. R. L. Jordan reported that the city was quiet.

Sgt. L. T. Barlow, head of the Cordele State Patrol post, said more than 200 Negroes gathered at one time in the downtown area. He said the crowd milled around and several bottles were thrown. Minor injuries were reported and a few windows were broken.

Barlow said two persons were injured earlier in the afternoon at a state park swimming pool near here.

He said a truck driven by a Negro, Clemmie Gascon, 29, rammed his patrol car, knocking it into a youngster. The boy was not identified, he said. "We haven't been able to find him."

Gascon was arrested on a charge of assault with an automobile, Barlow said. The sergeant said Gascon was treated at a hospital for bruises and then turned over to authorities here.

Barlow said Cascon had driven the truck, loaded with Negro adults and children, to the swimming pool. Several other cars containing Negroes arrived at about the same time, he said.

About 100 white persons were in the area, he said, but the cause of the bottle throwing had not been determined.

"I don't know how it started," he said. "There was some bottle-throwing. I guessed it lasted about 15 minutes."

The Student Non-violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) said at least one other person had been arrested.

Barlow said other arrests were pending but he declined to reveal details.

Lt. Jordan said he understood the truckload of Negroes was attacked by some white men when the Negroes attempted to go swimming in the already-desegregated pool. He said he had no details.

Crisp County Sheriff Earlie Posey could not be reached for comment.

Cordele Police Chief T. J. McMurrain said no arrests had been made in the city as a result of the Sunday night confrontation.

"It's bad that innocent people get hurt in a thing like this," McMurrain said. "We've had windshields knocked out and people hit with rocks that had nothing to do with this."

The FBI said it would begin immediately an investigation to determine if there had been any violation of civil rights laws in the incidents.

THE NEW YORK TIMES, THURSDAY, JUNE 30, 1966.

Curfew Is Imposed in Cordele, Ga., After Racial Gun Battle

CORDELE, Ga., June 29 (UPI) — An all-night curfew was imposed on this south Georgia town today after whites and Negroes exchanged gunfire for 90 minutes early this morning.

It was the third straight nigh of violence in this town of 10,600.

Twenty state trooptrs moved in to help the city police to preserve order and enforce the curfew. The curfew, imposed by the City Commission, will be in force from 8:30 P.M. to 5 A.M. No one will be allowed on the streets except for emergencies and anyone leaving home must telephone the police first. No business will be open at night.

The commission also adopted a measure prohibiting crowds from forming. The six commissioners said both measures would remain in effect until law officials approved their repeal.

Col. Lowell Conner, head of the Georgia Highway Patrol, said he woul do "everything necessary to uphold the law in Cordele and Crisp County."

He said he was ready to increase the number of patrolmen in town.

The gunbattle that stretched into early morning was a continuation of violence that was touched off Sunday afternoon by a confrontation between whites and Negroes at an integrated swimming pool.

About 25 to 30 whites, many of whom arrived in cars with out-of-county license plates, gathered at a Negro-operated service station. They milled around and caused no trouble until a Negro youth hurled a bottle that smashed the windshield of a sports car driven by a white man.

About 10 of the white men then grabbed rifles, pistols and shotguns. One of them fired. Within seconds, Negroes hidden nearby began to fire.

The other armed white men then opened fire, despite police pleas over a bullhorn asking them to "Hold your fire, hold your fire."

No One Injured

No one was hurt, the police said, but the service station was badly shot up.

After a half hour, the whites stopped firing and the Negro snipers also quit shooting. Then a car entered the neighborhood, about six blocks from the county courthouse, and a shot that sounded as if it had come from a small-bore weapon, came from the vehicle.

The white men began shooting again, although observers could not tell the race of the car's occupants.

The shooting went on another hour. Perhaps five or six Negroes, moving from place to place, exchanged fire with the whites who remained at the service station.

About 25 state troopers from several south Georgia cities arrived and helped disperse the crowd. Five whites were taken into custody.

Negroes Swim in Park Pool Where Violence Once Flared

AC 7/14/66

CORDELE, Ga. (UPI)—More than 100 Negroes visited nearby Veterans' State Park Sunday and a few went swimming in the pool where racial violence flared a week ago, but there were no incidents.

The pool was less than one-third full. State parks director Horace Caldwell told the Negroes and the few white sympathizers who accompanied them that vandals had broken in and let some water out of the pool.

"Y'all can come back and swim tomorrow," Caldwell said. But some of the Negroes insisted on swimming then.

STREETS DESERTED

The streets of Cordele were deserted after the curfew went into effect Sunday night, the State Patrol reported, and a thunderstorm minimized the possibility of any trouble during the night.

The Negroes arrived during the afternoon in cars, a truck and a bus. They were closely guarded by more than 100 state troopers and sheriff's deputies, who lined the road from Cordele to Veteran's State Park and surrounded the pool.

Patrol Capt. R. J. Taft said a "large group" of white persons watched the Negroes arrive and enter the pool, but none were in the immediate pool area. He said most of the white persons just minded their own business in other areas of the park.

ALL IS QUIET

"Everything was just as quiet as could be," Taft said.

The Negroes bought candy and soft drinks at a concession stand, swam for about two hours and then went back to Cordele while the troopers again lined the road.

State Public Safety Director Col. Lowell Conner said his men would patrol Cordele Sunday night and would be on hand for any further developments Monday.

"They (the Negroes) are to let me know their plans tomorrow (Monday)," Conner said, "They said today they didn't know what they would do. We'll be around on Monday, but there was nothing to it today."

VIOLENCE FLARES

Racial violence and vandalism flared in Cordle last Sunday after a group of white men attacked a group of Negroes at the park pool. Young Negroes roamed the streets tossing rocks and bottles through windows.

Gunfire erupted later in the week and several fires were set, but no injuries or serious damage was reported. A strict 8:30 p.m. to 5 a.m. curfew was imposed Wednesday and remains in effect.

The Negro driver who first brought the Negroes to the pool, Clemmie Gaston, faces trial on charges of assault with attempt to murder sheriff Earlie Posey and on disorderly conduct charges.

Klan and Rights Units Warned on Parks Use

GEORGIA AC 7/19/66

From Press Dispatches

State Parks Director Horace Caldwell Monday promised a crackdown on the use of state parks by organizations such as the Ku Klux Klan and civil rights groups.

Meanwhile, at Cordele charges of possessing riot equipment lodged against seven white men as they entered a state park where a Ku Klux Klan rally was scheduled may go before a grand jury which convenes next Monday.

Crisp County Sheriff E. E. Posey said Monday that to his knowledge none of the seven had requested a preliminary hearing.

They were arrested Sunday as state troopers and sheriff's deputies found two tear gas pens, two crash helmets and a screwdriver during a search of vehicles entering Georgia Veterans State Park, where an interracial brawl had erupted three weeks before.

About 600 whites watched the afternoon Klan rally at the park while about 50 Negroes swam or lounged at a pool about a quarter-mile away.

Protesting what it called an illegal search, the Klan organized a brief, orderly march around the Crisp County Courthouse after the rally. The seven arrested were released after $500 bond each was put up for them.

Cordele Circuit Solicitor Harvey Jay said he had not been officially informed of the charges, but that if no hearing is requested the case probably would go to the grand jury which convenes next Monday.

Caldwell said the groups could not be kept from using the parks but that park rules would be strictly enforced in the future. He enumerated four specific rules violated by the Klan at the rally led by Grand Dragon Calvin Craig Sunday — using a public address system, distributing literature, selling pennants, and the wearing of a Klan robe by Craig.

Caldwell said Sheriff Posey was mistaken in ordering newsmen not to photograph the rally, which drew about 500 persons. Posey told newsmen "the state" had issued rules against the use of cameras.

Caldwell emphasized that the crackdown on park use was not directed along racial lines.

Caldwell emphasized that most groups were still welcome to use state parks as long as they strictly observed the rules.

Weltner Quits House Race Rather Than Back Maddox

GEORGIA 10/4/66

By GENE ROBERTS

Special to The New York Times

ATLANTA, Oct. 3—Representative Charles Longstreet Weltner gave up today the Democratic nomination for a third term in Congress rather than abide by a party loyalty oath that would have required him to support the arch segregationist, Lester G. Maddox, for Governor.

"I cannot compromise with hate," said Mr. Weltner, who represents the Atlanta area and has voted for three consecutive civil rights bills.

His decision, believed to be unparalleled in Georgia in modern times, compounded the shock that has pervaded the liberal and moderate wing of Georgia's Democratic party since a runoff election on Sept. 29.

On that day Mr. Maddox, who once sold ax handles to combat desegregation of his restaurant, soundly defeated Ellis Arnall, a racial moderate and former Governor, for the Democratic gubernatorial nomination.

Despite the shock of that result, however, no one had expected any protest as dramatic as that made by Representative Weltner today.

"The Democratic National Committee has been calling all around wanting to know what in God's name is going on," said one political ally of Mr. Weltner. "And all we can tell them is that the guy is standing on principle. It's as simple as that."

Mr. Weltner called Mr. Maddox "the one man in our state who exists as the very symbol of violence and oppression," and added:

"While I cannot violate my oath, I cannot violate my principles."

He said, however, that he could not bring himself to vote for Representative Howard H. Callaway, the Republican candidate, either, and would write in a candidate for Governor in the general election on Nov. 8.

This determination to write in a name, he said, left him with no alternative, in view of the loyalty oath, except to withdraw as the Democratic nominee from the Fifth Congressional District.

The oath requires candiates for nomination in Democratic primaries to "pledge myself to support at the general elections of Nov. 8, 1966, all candidates nominated by the Democratic party of the state of Georgia."

The oath has to be witnesses and notarized by each candidate, before they can qualify to run in Democratic primaries.

Wording of Oath Revised

George D. Stewart, secretary of the Georgia Democratic party, said he revised the wording of the oath when he assumed office 17 years ago during the era of the Dixiecrat revolt in the South, similar oaths, he said, have been the practice in Georgia "for the past 100 years.'

Some Democratic candidates, however, are little concerned by the oath. Among them is State Senator Leroy Johnson, a Negro who signed it to qualify for his successful race for the Democratic nomination for a third term in the Georgia Senate.

He said today that he would refuse to support Mr. Maddox, and would be "seriously interested" in taking Representative Weltner's place as the Democratic nominee for Congress in the Fifth District.

The district's Democratic executive committee will choose a replacement for Mr. Weltner. Many political observers believe it is too much worried over the possibility of a Republican sweep in November to risk a Negro candidate for Congress. Thus, Senator Johnson's chances of getting the nomination were regarded here as slim.

Mr. Weltner declined comment on Senator Johnson's aspirations, but said he did not agree with the view that the Republicans will win in November.

He said that Mr. Maddox had an "overwhelming chance" of winning because he had taken Representative Callaway's "big issue—the race issue"—away from him.

"Callaway is the same as Maddox on race except in a slicker way," Mr. Welt said. "He uses code names such as property rights, which means we ain't gonna to serve no niggers."

The first reaction of politicians here was that Representative Weltner's withdrawal (he will continue to serve out his present term, which ends in January) greatly improves the chances of Republicans for capturing the Congressional seat. The Republican candidate is State Senator Fletcher Thompson.

But whether the withdrawal of Mr. Weltner will improve the Republicans' chances of capturing the Governor's office mise with hate. I cannot support Lester Maddox.

"Therefore, I am withdrawing as the Democratic nominee for the House of Representatives.

"I do so with abiding gratitude for the many friends who have sustained me—and with deep regret I love the Congress But I will give up my office before I give up my principles"

After he put the statement aside, Mr. Weltner told reporter that his decision was a s clear-cut as he had made it sound.

"I am definitely out of politics this November, either as a party candidate or as a write-in candidate," he said.

He said, however, that he hoped to return to politics "some tim ein the future."

He said that the decision he reached today had been the toughest od his 39 years, tougher than his decision two years ago when he first voted against the Civil Rights Act of 1964, but then switched his vote when the bill came before the House in revised form.

Decision Stuns Congress

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Oct. 3—Congress was stunned today by Representative Weltner's decision to give up his House seat rather than support Mr. Maddox for Governor.

One after another, as word of Mr. Weltner's decision spread through the House and Senate Chambers, members slipped out to the lobbies and read the news from Atlanta on the wire tickers.

They stood there, the long sheets of ticker copy in hand, shaking their heads in disbelief. Some walked away silently. Others conversed quietly.

Some viewed the action as a modern footnote to President John F. Kennedy's book, "Profiles in Courage," accounts of politicians who had faced up to difficult decisions.

"It was a very wonderful and courageous action," said Representative Emanuel Celler, Democrat of Brooklyn.

"Charlie Weltner is one of the finest and bravest men I have ever met in all my years in public life," House Speaker John W. McCormack commented.

But others, principally Deep South Democrats, regarded Mr. Weltner's move as an admission that he feared that white backlash sentiment might defeat him in November because of his liberal voting record.

"I guess Charlie knew when to get out," said one Southerner, who asked not to be named.

"I'm surprised, that's all. I can say right now," said Representative Hale Boggs, Democrat of Louisiana, the acting majority leader. "He didn't talk to me."

Representative James A. Mackay, who comes closer to sharing Mr. Weltner's liberal views than any other member of the Georgia delegation, said he was "astounded, just astounded." "Charlie didn't tell me a thing, and I saw him just last Saturday," Mr. Mackay added.

Mr. Mackay said he respected his colleague's decision, but would not follow his lead.

"I will vote the Democratic ticket," Mr. Mackay said. "My position is that if there was ever a time to fight for rational leadership in Georgia, it's now. I'm an American first and a Southerner second."

While pledging to vote for Mr. Maddox, Mr. Mackay said he will not campaign for him.

"I expect to see a Southern renassance someday soon," Mr. Mackay said. "This could be the dark before the dawn."

Other members of the Georgia delegation said that they, too, would support Mr. Maddox.

"It's very easy for me to support the nominee," said Representative Maston O'Neal. "In fact, it will be a lot easier than it was two years ago to support L.B.J."

Representative Phil M. Landrum, smiling broadly, said he would "do everything I can to help [Mr. Maddox] make skillet-fried Pickrick chicken in our new million dollar Governor's mansion."

But whether the withdrawal of Mr. Weltner will improve the Republicans' chances of capturing the Governor's office was problematical.

The Congressman's announcement that he would write in a name for Governor could give impetus to a drive among Negroes and white liberals for a write-in campaign. Possibly this would be for State Senator James Carter, who ran third behind Mr. Maddox and Mr. Arnall in the Democratic gubernatorial primary, but thus far has been opposed to the write-in proposal.

Cool to Write-in Plan

Mr. Weltner said he was not interested in being a write-in candidate himself, either for Congress or for Governor, and said he believed the write-in idea would be "futile" for anyone who tries it. He said he planned to write in a name only because he could bring himself to vote for either of the two party candidates.

Only three days ago Mr. Weltner said he would abide by the Democratic loyalty oath, but at a news conference this morning in his Atlanta office he told reporters he had been wrestling with his problem for several days and reached his new decsiion only at 2:30 this morning.

"I called my wife in Washington," he said, "and she said 'You're kidding.'"

It was clear, too, that the Congressman's staff had been caught by surprise. A secretary fought to keep back the tears as Mr. Weltner read his formal statement of withdrawal.

"On Oct. the 1st," Mr. Weltner said, "I made the following statement:

"'As all Democratic candidates, I signed a pledge to support on Nov. 8 the nominees of the Democratic primary. And though I have always opposed Mr. Maddox in the past, I cannot violate my oath.'

Baker Schools Get Threat of Boycott

Snick and Negro Parents Ask State Patrol Guard Children

By CHARLES MOORE

The Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) and some Negro parents Wednesday threatened a school boycott in Baker County unless the State Patrol and federal marshals are sent immediately to protect Negro students who recently integrated white schools.

"The handful of black students who have integrated the white elementary and high schools have been subjected to a steady stream of violence, insults and harassment from white students, with the approval of white teachers, the principal and school administrators," said Mrs. Josie Miller, mother of three children attending a former all-white school.

Julian Bond

However, Baker County Sheriff L. W. Johnson said Wednesday he had received no reports of any violence or threats made to the Negro students.

"This is the first I've heard of it," Sheriff Johnson said. "We don't go up to the school house unless we get a call so I don't know what goes on. But I do know we haven't had a complaint made to my office."

PRESS CONFERENCE

Some nine Negro children, accompanied by five parents, held a press conference in Atlanta Wednesday to air their complaints. Introducing them was Julian Bond, state representative-elect. Newsmen were given a statement on the situation by Stokely Carmichael, Snick chairman, who did not attend.

Bond, who announced a few weeks ago he had quit Snick after he said some of the leaders were "kinda crazy" and because he hadn't been paid, said his and Marmichael's connection with the Baker County situation did not mean he again was associated with Snick.

Mrs. Miller read a mimeographed statement by the Negro parents and students in the deep southwest Georgia county that said in part:

"We demand that the State Patrol and federal marshals be sent immediately to protect the black students attending Baker County elementary and high schools. If this is not done, we will instigate a school boycott, withdrawing all black students from the white and black schools — until our demands are met.

EQUAL PAY ASKED

"Furthermore, we demand that the entire school system—faculty and students — be immediately integrated. We demand that equal salaries be paid to both black and white teachers, and we will not tolerate the firing of black teachers.

"If our demands are not met, we will be forced to take further action."

Asked what "further action" was under consideration, Mrs. Miller said, "We will march on the streets in Baker County and and around the school until something happens."

Pupils at the press conference were Annie Lee Benton, 15; Carrie Mae Miller, 16; Sandra Miller, 15; Annie Laurine Benton, 17; Jerry Benton, 16; Roosevelt Williams, 17; Eddie Broadway, 14, and Marvin Miller, 14.

MADDOX REBUFFED BY GEORGIA GROUPS

GEORGIA 10/8/66

Special to The New York Times

ATLANTA, Oct. 6—Lester G. Maddox, the Democratic candidate for Governor, was repudiated here Thursday night by the executive committee of the Georgia Young Democrats and by 250 leaders and active workers in the Democratic party in Atlanta and surrounding Fulton County.

The Young Democrats said that Mr. Maddox, an arch segregationist, had proved himself disloyal to the Democratic party by supporting Barry Goldwater, the Republican Presidential nominee in 1964. They urged a write-in campaign for former Gov. Ellis G. Arnall, who was defeated by Mr. Maddox on Sept. 28 in a runoff campaign for the Democratic governorship nomination.

The Atlanta and Fulton County group declared that Mr. Maddox does not accept the national Democratic party's platform on race and thus was not an acceptable candidate to them.

The group, which calls itself the Fulton County Democratic party but did not act at a formal county convention, provides the financial support for a full-time executive secretary and a party headquarters here.

"There comes a time when higher moral principles must dictate the course of action," said Jack Turner, the group's spokesman, who is a member of the Fulton County Democratic executive committee.

58 Negro Pupils Boycott Baker High

NEWTON, Ga. (AP) — All but one of 59 Negro pupils at desegregated Baker County High School stayed home Monday.

Eugene Hall, county superintendent of education, said the absences apparently constituted a boycott arising from an altercation Oct. 18, among two white boys and a Negro youth.

Hall said the white boys were suspended for 10 school days and that their case is to come up next Tuesday before the County Board of Education, which will decide whether to reinstate them.

Hall said the Baker school's Negro pupils attended classes Wednesday, Thursday and Friday after the incident and that there was no trouble. He said he did not know why the apparent boycott came Monday.

Earlier this month some Negro parents and the the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee had threatened a school boycott at Newton unless state and federal officers were sent to protect Negro pupils from alleged beatings and harassment.

Hall said Baker school authorities have done everything they could be meet requests of Negro parents and pupils and that there had been no incidents which would warrant any outside action.

He said no decision has been made about any disciplinary action against pupils who fail to report Monday.

THE NEW YORK TIMES, M

Arnall Vote May Send Georgia Race to Legislature

By GENE ROBERTS
Special to The New York Times

ATLANTA, Oct. 30—Negro disenchantment with both the Democratic and Republican candidates for Governor could send Georgia's gubernatorial race to the State Legislature for a final decision.

Some of the state's most influential Negro leaders and voter organizations have made this possibility a distinct one in recent days by joining with disgruntled white liberals and moderates in a write-in campaign for former Gov. Ellis Arnall.

This may prevent either Representative Howard H. Callaway, the Republican candidate, or Lester G. Maddox, the Democratic nominee, from receiving a majority of the votes.

In such a case, according to Georgia's Secretary of State, Ben Fortson Jr., the state's top election official, a provision of the Georgia Constitution stipulates that the election be placed before the State Legislature where lawmakers would chose between the two top vote-getters.

Georgia's Legislature is heavily Democratic and likely to favor Mr. Maddox, one of the South's most militant segregationists. But many Negroes and some disgrunted white moderates and liberals are obviously prepared to take this risk.

Hosea Williams, chief southern aide to the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., told the 800 Negro and white delegates to a workshop in Macon yesterday that he would rather see Mr. Maddox as Governor than make it appear that Negroes support the policies advocated by Represenative Callaway.

By voting in Congress against Medicare, minimum wage legislation, civil rights bills and other Great Society programs, Mr. Collaway has made it clear that he is "opposed to everything we stand for," Mr. Williams asserted.

Both Mr. Williams and State Senator LeRoy Johnson of Atlanta, another influential Negro leader, conceded there was only a thin chance of getting Mr. Arnall into a legislative runoff.

However they think it is important for a sizable number of Georgia voters to speak out against both Mr. Maddox and Mr. Callaway.

Although a three-member panel of Federal judges ruled Friday against the use of gummed stickers for the write-County, which adjoins Atlanta.

The DeKalb Congressman, Representative James A. Mackay, voted for the Voting Rights Act of 1965 and is generally considered to be the state's most liberal Congressional candidate.

Although Mr. Maddox is bitterly opposed by many of the state's leading industrialists and businessmen, he has active support from former Gov. Marvin Griffin, former House Speaker Roy Harris, and Lieut. Gov. Garland Byrd — all segregationists.

He has an endorsement, but not active support, from Gov. Carl E. Sanders. Jimmy Carter, a moderate, who ran third in the initial Democratic primary, recently appeared on a speaker's platform with Mr. Maddox.

Although recent polls had shown Representative Callaway to be leading Mr. Maddox, but with less than a majority of the vote, many politicians disregard the polls.

They note that Mr. Maddox, who once brandished a pistol and sold ax handles to combat restaurant desegregation, has many quiet supporters and ran ahead of poll prediction in the Democratic primary.

With most polls showing a 25 per cent undecided vote, they say, there are more than enough uncommitted voters either to send the race into the legislature or to elect Mr. Maddox.

Meanwhile, there is a strong class issue in the campaign even though Mr. Maddox and Mr. Callaway are both advocating educational improvement and an industrial drive to create more jobs.

In an Atlanta suburb, for example, a prosperous salesman says he shudders to think what might happen to the state's reputation if Mr. Maddox, who dropped out of high school to support his family during the Depression, were elected.

But in Ellaville in southwest Georgia, Pat Patrick, a paper company employe, is worried about the family wealth of Mr. Callaway, a textile heir and West Point graduate.

"The minute the doctor slapped 'Bo' Callaway on the butt," Mr. Patrick said, "he was a millionaire."

However, many rank-and-file voters are shifting between the Republican and Democratic camps, a factor that tends to blur attempts to predict the outcome of the race.

In Little Montezuma, in southwest Georgia, Oscar Williams, a filling station operator, said he had voted for Mr. Maddox in the Democratic primary in which the fiery segregationist defeated former Governor Arnall by drawing 450,000 votes to the latter's 380,000 votes.

However they think it is important for a sizable number of Georgia voters to speak out against both Mr. Maddox and Mr. Callaway.

Although a three-member panel of Federal judges ruled Friday against the use of gummed stickers for the write-in campaign, it nevertheless gave the campaign a major lift by declaring, in effect, that each write-in campaign worker could assist up to 10 illiterate Negroes in marking their ballots during the election on Nov. 8.

The write-in campaign received a further assist over the weekend when two major Negro organizations—the Atlanta Negro Voters League and the Macon Voters League—voted overwhelmingly to give it their support.

Supporter Booed

Representative Callaway has token support among Negro leaders, but last week when C. A. Scott, publisher of the Negro Daily World in Atlanta, appeared before a Negro luncheon club in Atlanta to back Mr. Callaway's candidacy, he was roundly booed.

With Negroes constituting about 18 per cent of the state's 1.7 million registered voters, it is no secret that Mr. Callaway, who appears to be gaining momentum, is alarmed by the write-in campaign.

This was underlined recently when Mr. Callaway was seen leaving the office of Eugene Patterson, editor of The Atlanta Constitution and a sharp critic of both the Callaway and the Maddox campaigns.

If Mr. Callaway had hoped to persuade Mr. Patterson to endorse his candidacy or speak out against the write-in campaign, he was quickly disappointed.

The next day's Constitution carried a cartoon showing a Georgia voter holding his nose at the thought of voting for either Mr. Callaway or Mr. Maddox.

Mr. Callaway's strongest support lies among middle- and upper-income voters in the state's cities. But despite heavy campaign spending for television time, he is still weak among blue-collar workers in the cities and in rural areas, especially in the region south of Atlanta.

Loss of House Seat Seen

Republicans, for example, are expected to lose Mr. Callaway's House seat in southwest Georgia—the only one they had won in the state since Reconstruction.

But they are given at least a chance, and perhaps a strong one, to take three other Congressional districts — embracing Savannah, Atlanta and DeKalb

Griffin, former House Speaker Roy Harris, and Lieut. Gov. Garland Byrd — all segregationists.

He has an endorsement, but not active support, from Gov. Carl E. Sanders. Jimmy Carter, a moderate, who ran third in the initial Democratic primary, recently appeared on a speaker's platform with Mr. Maddox.

GEORGIA

Text of High Court's Opinion Upholding State

WASHINGTON (AP) — Following is the text of the Supreme Court's opinion that the Georgia Legislature may elect the governor:

Mr. Justice Black delivered the opinion of the court:

Since 1824 a provision of the Constitution of the State of Georgia, now Art. V, Section 1, Paragraph 4, has provided that its governor shall be selected (1) by a majority of votes cast in a general election, and (2) if no candidate receives a majority of votes at such election, then a majority of the members of the Georgia General Assembly shall elect the governor "from the two persons having the highest number of votes . . ." at the state's general election, held Tuesday, Nov. 8, 1966, no single candidate received a majority of the votes cast. A Georgia three-judge federal district court has in this case enjoined the state assembly from electing one of the two highest candidates as governor on the ground that this method of election, required by Article V of the Georgia Constitution, would deny Georgia voters equal protection of the law in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. We uphold the constitutionality of Article V of the State Constitution, for so long as this provision is applied as it is written, we perceive no conflict with the equal protection clause. We reverse the district court's judgment.

Erroneous Reliance

The district court erroneously relied on Gray V. Sanders, 372 U.S. 368, for striking down Article V of the State's Constitution. The Gray case held that it had been demonstrated that Georgia voters were denied equal protection of the law by the operation of a county-unit system under which state officials were elected by a majority of counties voting as units instead of by a majority of individual voters. The result was that the number of votes of persons living in large counties was given no more weight in electing state officers than was given to a far fewer number of votes of persons residing in small counties. This discrimination against large county voters was held to deny them the equal protection of the law. This case, as was 1824 and was readopted by the people in 1945. It set up two ways to select the governor. The first, and preferred one, was election by a majority of the people; the second, and alternative one, was election by the state assembly if any one candidate failed to receive a majority of the popular vote. Under the second method, in the legislative election the votes of the people were not to be disregarded but the state assembly was to consider them as, in effect, nominating votes and to limit itself to choosing between the two persons on whom the people had bestowed the highest number of votes. There is no provision of the United States Constitution or any of its amendments which either expressly or impliedly dictates the method a state must use to select its governor. A method which would be valid if initially employed is equally valid when employed as an alternative. It would be surprising to conclude that, after a state has already held two primaries and one general election to try to elect by a majority, the United States Constitution compels it to continue to hold elections in a futile effort to obtain a majority for some particular candidate.

Time and Money

Statewide elections cost time and money and it is not strange that Georgia's people decided to avoid repeated elections. The method they chose for this purpose was not unique, but well known and frequently utilized before and since the Revolutionary War. Georgia governors were selected by the state legislature, not the people, until 1824. At that time a new constitution provided for popular election, but with the provision that upon the failure of any one candidate to receive a majority, the General Assembly should elect.

Two states, Mississippi and Vermont, that provide for majority voting also provide for state legislature election of their governors in case of no majority in the general election. Thirty-eight states of the union which today provide for election of their governors by a plurality also provide that in case of a tie vote the state legislatures shall elect.

parties contend, the entire legislative body is incapable of performing its responsibility of electing a governor because it is malapportioned. But this is not correct.

Held Qualified

In Toombs V. Fortson, 384 U.S. 210, affirming 241 F. Supp. 65, we held that with certain exceptions, not here material, the Georgia assembly could continue to function until May 1, 1968. Consequently the Georgia assembly is not disqualified to elect a governor as required by Article V of the state's Constitution. Neither is it disqualified by the fact that its Democratic members had obligated themselves to support the Democratic nominee in the general election on Nov. 8, 1966. That election is over, and with it, terminated any promises by the Democratic legislators to support the Democratic nominee.

Article V of Georgia's Constitution provides a method for selecting the governor which is as old as the nation itself. Georgia does not violate the equal protection clause by following this article as it was written.

FORMAL PORTRAIT OF THE MEMBERS OF THE U.S. SUPREME COURT WHO RULED MONDAY IN GEORGIA'S ELECTION DISPUTE
Seated L. to R.: Justices Clark, Black, Warren, Douglas, Harlan; Standing, White, Brennan, Stewart and Fortas

State Legislature to Elect Governor

doubt Monday that they were widely split on the case.

Four justices filed a dissenting opinion, and Justices Abe Fortas and William O. Douglas submitted a special dissent.

The primary dissenting opinion written by Justice Douglas would have upheld the lower court and directed the three-judge panel to order a runoff between Maddox and Callaway.

Dougla's opinion was the one sought by a bipartisan "citizens group" which was one of the plaintiffs in the appeal from the lower court.

The second plaintiff, the American Civil Liberties Union, had sought a special election which would have permitted write-in votes.

Writing the majority opinion, Justice Black said the lower court acted "erroneously" in judging that a legislative election would conflict with the one-man, one-vote principle the Supreme Court set down in 1963.

Citing the 1963 decision in which the court overthrew Georgia's county unit system, Black said there was "not a word in the court's opinion" then which implied a state cannot permit its legislative body to elect its governor.

"There is no provision of the United States Constitution or its Amendments which either expressly or impliedly dictates the method a state must use to select its governor," Black wrote.

Georgia was "clearly acting within its rights as a state" in directing the Legislature to break a stalemate in the gen- as an alternative," Black reasoned.

The 1963 decision, in the case of Gray vs. Sanders, "did no more than to require the state to eliminate the county unit machinery from its election system," the opinion continued.

The state followed this edict in holding a popular election, Black said. "Its duty now under . . . its Constitution is to proceed to have the General Assembly elect its governor. . ."

Black also dimissed arguments that the Legislature would not represent the people properly because it is malapportioned.

Citing the case of Toombs vs. Fortson, in which the Supreme Court sanctioned gradual reapportionment of the Georgia Legislature, Black said the high court has already held the General Assembly could function legislators to support the Democratic nominee."

Black's opinion was endorsed by Justices Tom C. Clark, John N. Harlan, Potter Stewart and Byron White.

In the primary dissenting opinion, Justice Douglas said he thought the majority of the court had "misstated the question" to be decided.

"It is not whether Georgia may select a governor through a legislative election," Douglas said. "It is whether the legislature may make the final choice when the election has been entrusted to the people . . ."

The dissenting opinion in which Justices William J. Brennan Jr. and Abe Fortas joined Douglas found no difference between a legislative election and the county unit system.

"All the vices we found inherent in the county unit sys-court's one-man, one-vote principle.

He said the 12th Amendment makes a specific exception to that principle in the case of the U.S. President, who is chosen by the Electoral College.

"There is no like exception in the choice of a governor," Douglas said.

In the opinion, Douglas warned that Monday's decision could serve as an instrument to perpetuate a one-party system in Georgia, since the heavily Democratic legislature would probably elect Maddox.

Even if the party oath is not binding, Douglas said, "we would be less than naive to believe that the momentum of that oath has now been dissipated and that the predominantly Democratic Legislature has now become neutral."

Douglas said he thought a

The choices of the two political parties are still in balance, he said. "The election will not be finally completed until the winner has taken the oath of office."

Douglas and Fortas also filed a separate dissent written by Fortas, pointing out that the decision could mean the legislature would choose Maddox over Callaway, even though Callaway received more votes Nov. 8.

According to unofficial returns, Callaway received 449,894 votes constituting 47.04 per cent. Maddox got 448,044 votes or 46.88 per cent. Both candidates were prevented from receiving a majority after 57,832 voters cast write-in ballots for former Gov. Ellis Arnall.

Referring to the possibility of the man with the most votes losing, Fortas wrote: "In my opinion, this scheme is forbidden by the equal protection

The district court erroneously relied on Gray V. Sanders, 372 U.S. 368, for striking down Article V of the State's Constitution. The Gray case held that it had been demonstrated that Georgia voters were denied equal protection of the law by the operation of a county-unit system under which state officials were elected by a majority of counties voting as units instead of by a majority of individual voters. The result was that the number of votes of persons living in large counties was given no more weight in electing state officers than was given to a far fewer number of votes of persons residing in small counties. This discrimination against large county voters was held to deny them the equal protection of the law. This case, as was emphasized, had to do with the equal right of "all who participate in the election," 373 U.S., at 379, to vote and have their votes counted without impairment or dilution. But as the court said, 373 U.S., at 378, the case was "only a voting case." Not a word in the court's opinion indicated that it was intended to compel a state to elect its governors or any other state officers or agents through elections of the people rather than through selections by appointment or elections by the state assembly. It is wrongly cited as having either expressly or impliedly decided that a state cannot, if it wishes, permit its legislative body to elect its governor.

The language of Article V of the State Constitution struck down by the district court has been a part of Georgia's State Constitution since

Time and Money

Statewide elections cost time and money and it is not strange that Georgia's people decided to avoid repeated elections. The method they chose for this purpose was not unique, but well known and frequently utilized before and since the Revolutionary War. Georgia governors were selected by the state legislature, not the people, until 1824. At that time a new constitution provided for popular election, but with the provision that upon the failure of any one candidate to receive a majority, the General Assembly should elect.

Two states, Mississippi and Vermont, that provide for majority voting also provide for state legislature election of their governors in case of no majority in the general election. Thirty-eight states of the union which today provide for election of their governors by a plurality also provide that in case of a tie vote the state legislatures shall elect.

It thus turns out that Georgia, clearly acting within its rights as a state, has decided that, any one candidate failing to obtain a majority in a general election, its General Assembly will elect its governor. Its clear choice has remained in its Constitution for 142 years. The district court below treated Article V of the Georgia Constitution as the valid law of the state except as it thought itself compelled to strike it down because of Gray v. Sanders, supra. The Gray case, however, did no more than to require the state to eliminate the county-unit machinery from its election system. The state did this in an election that resulted in the election of no candidate. Its duty now, under Article V of its Constitution, is to proceed to have the General Assembly elect its governor from the two highest candidates in the election, unless, as some of the a part of this case," and though they found it an interesting question, had not considered it.

Omer Franklin, president of the state bar of Georgia, said, "All lawyers, as officers of the court, should support the Supreme Court rulings as the law of the land. This leaves the legislature with quite a responsibility."

Former Gov. Ellis Arnall, whose write-in votes kept either Maddox or Callaway from getting a majority, called his office from Miami and said he would make no comment on the decision.

The harshest comment of the day came not from a lawyer but from Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., who declared:

"It is both unfortunate and tragic that the Supreme Court today in effect struck a lethal blow at truly representative government. The high court's ruling that the Georgia legislature could decide who will govern this state disfranchises the individual voters and usurps the power of the ballot.

"The Georgia legislature is by no means representative of the citizens and the one-man, one-vote theory is still a mythical concept which this state's politicians would find too expensive. It is my hope that the legislature itself will realize that it is not properly apportioned and therefore will not vote to seat either of the gubernatorial candidates," the Nobel prize winner said.

Write-in, Georgia, Inc., which sponsored the write-in vote for Arnall, threatened, as it has since the Nov. 8 election, to go into federal court and challenge the validity of the election, charging that over 100,000 votes for Arnall were not counted because of spelling and other decisions by poll managers.

Most lawyers found the decision no surprise in view of comments they had heard were made from the bench during arguments in the case. Some old line states righters found it a bit inconsistent in view of other rulings.

One attorney noted that there are significant differences, however, in the issues involved in the seating of Julian Bond, which was based on freedom of speech, and the idea of legislatures choosing a governor, even though the powers of the legislature are involved in both.

To state unequivocally that a legislature could not decide on a governor where the constitution provided for it would not only upset election procedures in 30-odd states (the court showed a willingness, at least, to do this in legislative reapportionment) but would put a number of other things in question.

State Legislature to Elect Governor

doubt Monday that they were widely split on the case.

Four justices filed a dissenting opinion, and Justices Abe Fortas and William O. Douglas submitted a special dissent.

The primary dissenting opinion written by Justice Douglas would have upheld the lower court and directed the three-judge panel to order a runoff between Maddox and Callaway.

Dougla's opinion was the one sought by a bipartisan "citizens group" which was one of the plaintiffs in the appeal from the lower court.

The second plaintiff, the American Civil Liberties Union, had sought a special election which would have permitted write-in votes.

Writing the majority opinion, Justice Black said the lower court acted "erroneously" in judging that a legislative election would conflict with the one-man, one-vote principle the Supreme Court set down in 1963.

Citing the 1963 decision in which the court overthrew Georgia's county unit system, Black said there was "not a word in the court's opinion" then which implied a state cannot permit its legislative body to elect its governor.

"There is no provision of the United States Constitution or its Amendments which either expressly or impliedly dictates the method a state must use to select its governor," Black wrote.

Georgia was "clearly acting within its rights as a state" in directing the Legislature to break a stalemate in the general election, Black said.

The Georgia Constitution would have been valid, Black continued, even if it had prescribed that the Legislature elect the governor in the first place, without a popular election, as the state did until 1824.

"A method which would be valid if initially employed is equally valied when employed as an alternative," Black reasoned.

The 1963 decision, in the case of Gray vs. Sanders, "did no more than to require the state to eliminate the county unit machinery from its election system," the opinion continued.

The state followed this edict in holding a popular election, Black said. "Its duty now under . . . its Constitution is to proceed to have the General Assembly elect its governor. . ."

Black also dimissed arguments that the Legislature would not represent the people properly because it is malapportioned.

Citing the case of Toombs vs. Fortson, in which the Supreme Court sanctioned gradual reapportionment of the Georgia Legislature, Black said the high court has already held the General Assembly could function constitutionally as is until May 1, 1968.

The jurists also knocked down plaintiffs' claims that the predominantly Democratic Legislature would be bound by an oath requiring Democratic candidates to support the party's nominee in the Nov. 8 election.

"That election is over," Black said, "and with it terminated any promises of the Democratic legislators to support the Democratic nominee."

Black's opinion was endorsed by Justices Tom C. Clark, John N. Harlan, Potter Stewart and Byron White.

In the primary dissenting opinion, Justice Douglas said he thought the majority of the court had "misstated the question" to be decided.

"It is not whether Georgia may select a governor through a legislative election," Douglas said. "It is whether the legislature may make the final choice when the election has been entrusted to the people . . ."

The dissenting opinion in which Justices William J. Brennan Jr. and Abe Fortas joined Douglas found no difference between a legislative election and the county unit system.

"All the vices we found inherent in the county unit system," the minority said, "are inherent when the choice is left to the Legislature."

Even if a legislator followed the majority vote of his constituency, Douglas reasoned, he would still be disregarding the votes of those who marked their ballots for the other candidate.

Douglas also disputed Black's contention that a legislative election would not violate the court's one-man, one-vote principle.

He said the 12th Amendment makes a specific exception to that principle in the case of the U.S. President, who is chosen by the Electoral College.

"There is no like exception in the choice of a governor," Douglas said.

In the opinion, Douglas warned that Monday's decision could serve as an instrument to perpetuate a one-party system in Georgia, since the heavily Democratic legislature would probably elect Maddox.

Even if the party oath is not binding, Douglas said, "we would be less than naive to believe that the momentum of that oath has now been dissipated and that the predominantly Democratic Legislature has now become neutral."

Douglas said he thought a legislative election was only one of two stages in the popular election machinery set down in the 1824 Georgia Constitution.

"The first stage," Douglas said, "then as now, was an election open to 'the persons qualified to vote for members of the General Assembly.' "

Douglas said that any argument that the first stage is over with is "belied by the realities."

The choices of the two political parties are still in balance, he said. "The election will not be finally completed until the winner has taken the oath of office."

Douglas and Fortas also filed a separate dissent written by Fortas, pointing out that the decision could mean the legislature would choose Maddox over Callaway, even though Callaway received more votes Nov. 8.

According to unofficial returns, Callaway received 449,894 votes constituting 47.04 per cent. Maddox got 448,044 votes or 46.88 per cent. Both candidates were prevented from receiving a majority after 57,832 voters cast write-in ballots for former Gov. Ellis Arnall.

Referring to the possibility of the man with the most votes losing, Fortas wrote: "In my opinion, this scheme is forbidden by the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment."

Fortas said the decision Monday—no less than the county unit system—meant that "the vote cast by a citizen is subject to nullification by the Legislature."

"If the voting right is to mean anything," he said, "it certainly must be protected against the possibility that the victory will go to the loser."

Maddox--If Pattern Is Counties

Assuming that legislators vote for a governor according to the Nov. 8 general election pluralities in their home districts, it appears that Democrat Lester G. Maddox would be the next governor by a narrow margin.

Although many House members represent more than one county, a survey of the results after the general election showed that Maddox would get the nod of approximately 106 of 205 House members and Callaway would take some 99 House votes.

Maddox carried 127 counties, Callaway 31, and the write-in effort for former Gov. Ellis Arnall netted one county—Liberty.

Predicting the decision of Senate members on the basis of Nov. 8 returns is more difficult since most senatorial districts involve three to eight counties. Results were neck-and-neck in many districts.

All of the large-county senatorial districts went for Callaway, giving the Republican 23 of the 54 Senate votes on that basis.

The plight of some House members on Jan. 10 is illustrated by the fact that six House districts with two counties each were split down the middle, one county going for Callaway and the other backing Maddox.

There were three House districts in which one county went for Callaway and the other two for Maddox.

And then there was the Liberty - McIntosh district in which write-in voters snared Liberty for Arnall and Callaway narrowly eked out a win in McIntosh.

The survey did not take party loyalties and political string-pulling into account.

Pair Hold Up Service Station

Two men riding in a lavender colored auto Monday night robbed a service station on South Main Street in East Point of an estimated $30, East Point police said.

The two, white, were described as "dirty looking" and armed with a .22-caliber revolver.

By Douglas and Fortas

Main Points in Dissents from Ruling

WASHINGTON (AP) — Following are pertinent excerpts from Supreme Court justices' dissenting from the majority finding that the Georgia Legislature may elect the governor of that state.

From a dissent by Justice William O. Douglas, concurred in by Chief Justice Earl Warren and Justices William J. Brennan Jr. and Abe Fortas:.

The court misstates the question we must decide. It is not whether Georgia may select a governor through a legislative election. It is whether the legislature may make the final choice when the election has been entrusted to the people and no candidate has received a majority of the votes. In other words, the legislative choice is only a part of the popular election machinery. The 1824 amendment to the 1798 Constitution of Georgia, which gave the legislature power to elect a governor, treated that stage as only one of two in the general election. The first stage, then as now, was an election open to "the persons qualified to vote for members of the General Assembly." Ga. Const., 1798 Art. II, Section 2, was amended, 1824.

It is said that the general election is over and that a new, and different, alternative procedure is now about to be used. But that is belied by the realities. The primary election selected the party candidates and the choices of the two parties are still in balance . . .

Our starting point is what we said in Gray v. Sanders . . .

"Once the geographical unit for which a representative is to be chosen is designated, all who participate in the election are to have an equal vote — whatever their race, whatever their sex, whatever their occupation, whatever their income, and whether ther home may be in that geographical unit. . . ."

It is argued with earnestness that if the Electoral College can be used to select a president, a legislature can be used to select a governor. It is said that there is no more a violation of the "one person, one vote" principle in the one than in the other. But the 12th Amendment creates the exception in case of a president. There is no like exception in the choice of a governor . . . .

If the legislature is used to determine the outcome of a general election, the votes cast in that election would be weighted, contrary to the principle of "one person, one vote." All the vices we found inherent in the county unit system in Gray v. Sanders are inherent when the choice is left to the legislature. A legislator when voting for governor has only a single vote. Even if he followed the majority vote of his constituency, he would necessarily disregard the votes of those who voted for the other candidate, whether their votes almost carried the day or were way in the minority. He would not be under a mandate to follow the majority or plurality votes in his constituency, but might cast his single vote on the side of the minority in his district. Even if he voted for the candidate receiving a plurality of votes cast in his district and even if each senator and representative followed the same course, a candidate who received a minority of the popular vote might receive a clear majority of the votes cast in the legislature . . .

Pledge Cited

What is approved today can, moreover, be the instrument to perpetuate a "one party" system in like derogation of the principle of "one person, one vote." The pledge that every Democratic member of the Georgia legislature took provides in part: "I further pledge myself to support at the general election of November 8, 1966, all candidates nominated by the Democratic Party of the State of Georgia." That election has not been completed. We are, as I have said, in the second stage of it. The Democrats control 183 seats in a 205-member house and 46 seats in a 54-member senate. We would be less than naive to believe that the momentum of that oath has now been dissipated and that the predominantly Democratic legislature has now become neutral . . . .

I would affirm the judgment of the three-judge court and remand the cause for the fashioning of an appropriate decree for a runoff election in which the people's choice will be determined.

From a separate dissent by Justice Fortas, joined by Justice Douglas:

If the voting right is to mean anything, it certainly must be protected against the possibility that victory will go to the loser . . . .

It distorts reality to say, as the majority here do, that this election is to be scrubbed and ignored, and to proceed as if we were dealing with a situation in which Georgia's Constitution merely provided for the selection of a governor by the legislature. That is not the case. If it were the intent of the Constitution to scrub the popular election and to cause selection by the legislature as an independent process, the legislature would not be bound to select from the two who received at the polls the highest number of votes. The legislature would be given free choice. As my brother Douglas' opinion shows, the Constitution attempts something quite different. It purports to give the legislature power to complete the process begun at the polls — to cast aside the vote of the electorate and award the office to the winner or the loser of the popular election, as it may see fit. . . .

The Georgia legislature is concededly malapportioned, and is under a federal court order to reapportion itself. . . . A majority of the legislators in Georgia's legislature may represent a minority of the voters. But the court today concludes that despite the fact that it has branded the legislature as apportioned in violation of the Constitution of the United States, it may nevertheless select the governor. . . .

First Such Action

We have declined to deprivate a malapportioned legislature of its de facto status as a legislature. But not until today has this court allowed a malapportioned legislature to be the device for doing indirectly what a state may not do directly. . . .

Indeed, the irony of the matter is that three-judge federal court held that the Georgia legislature was so malapportioned that it could not properly submit to the voters a new Constitution, adopted by both houses of the Georgia legislature, which would have abolished the provisions for legislative selection of a governor and have substituted a runoff or special election . . . on appeal, this court per curiam, declined to rule that the district court's decree was unlawful, but because it was represented that the decree might be moot, the court remanded for reconsideration in light of the circumstances which allegedly made the decree no longer pertinent. . . . But now the court holds that this same, unreformed legislature is not so malapportioned that it cannnot itself select the governor by its direct action!—I confess total inability to understand how the two rulings can be reconciled. . . .

If a state can validly provide that the result at the polls can be disregarded and the outcome removed from Democratic processes where no candidate for governor received a majority, there is no reason why the same rule cannot be applied to legislators. Moreover, the court today announces in an offhand manner, as a side-effect of today's decision, without adequate argument or consideration, that a state may today, as some states did long ago, provide that its governor shall be selected by its legislature in total disregard of the voters. I do not believe that the issue is so easy. Much water has gone under the bridge since the late 1700's and the early 1800's Our understanding and conception of the rights guaranteed to the people by the "stately admonitions" of the 14th Amendment have deepened, and have resulted in a series of decisions, enriching the quality of our democracy, which certainly do not codify state's rights, governmental theories or conceptions of human liberties as they existed in 1824, the date when Georgia adopted its present system of choosing a governor. . . .

I do not believe that this court is the sole custodian of the Constitution, or of the democratic liberties of the people . . . . but if the people of Georgia — or Maine or California or New York, for that matter—should adopt a constitutional amendment to provide for election of their governor by the legislature—or for selection of the upper house of their legislature by their governor, for example —I do not believe that the constitutionality of these measures could be cavalierly assumed . . . .

This court's apportionment and voting rights decisions soundly reflect a deepening conception, in keeping with the development of our social, ethical, and religious understanding, of the meaning of our great constutional guaranties. As such, they have reinvigorated our national political life at its roots so that it may continue its growth to realization of the full stature of our constitutional deal. Today's decision is a startling reversal; a belittling, I say with all respect, of our Constitution's dynamic provisions with respect to the basic instrument of Democracy — the vote.

Atlanta Police Must Read Booklet Advising Slum Folk

AC 12/20/66

By DICK HEBERT

A booklet telling slum dwellers how to cope with police "who cannot learn to be fair and polite" has been made required reading for Atlanta policemen and is in snowballing demand by lawmen and slum-working civic groups across the country.

Chief Jenkins

About 23,000 copies of the simple-language handbook have been distributed and the American Civil Liberties Union of Georgia expects to bring that total to about 100,000 by spring, Executive Director Florence Robin said Monday.

The handbook, in publication only three months, is entitled "Know Your Rights," and repeatedly advises the poor:

"You have the right not to answer questions.

"You have the right not to sign anything.

"You have the right to a lawyer if you are arrested."

When several policemen asked the ACLU for copies of the booklet, Mrs. Robin wrote Chief Herbert T. Jenkins suggesting copies be given to newly recruited officers. He replied the following day with a request for 1,000 copies, and since has issued a bulletin stating:

"It is a very fine publication and every Atlanta police official must read it and understand it. . . . Members of this department are instructed to pick up their copies in the Training Division."

Since then requests have come for copies for distribution to police officers in Augusta, Tifton, Avondale Estates, Gainesville, Alma and court officials in Americus.

Other copies have gone to civic groups throughout most of the nation, including Hawaii, California, Rhode Island, Connecticut and South Carolina. As yet, unfilled orders have come from New Orleans, La., and Maryland, and antipoverty programs in Massachusetts and at the University of Michigan.

Mrs. Robin said she estimates distribution could run about a million copies if it were being sent out indiscriminately, but "we're sending only to policement and to people who deal with slum residents directly.

"I'm not interested in having middle-class ladies sitting around with the book and saying, 'Gee, gee, people ought to have their rights.' "

The 32-page illustrated booklet sells for 25 cents a copy but is given free to law-enforcement agencies, she said.

GEORGIA STUDENTS FOR HUMAN RIGHTS
52 FAIRLIE STREET, N.W.
ATLANTA, GEORGIA 30303

Dear Student,

Would you be interested in working with other Georgia students to improve human relations in our state?

Would you be interested in working with an organization of Georgia students dedicated to this purpose?

In an organization called the Georgia Students for Human Rights, the foundations have been laid. The GSHR was formed in February, 1964 by a group of interested students from several college campuses in the Atlanta area. The formation of the group stemmed from the need for communication and participation in the civil rights movement among college students. As interest in the GSHR grew, the Atlanta meetings were attended by larger numbers of both white and Negro students, some of whom were interested in direct action, others were interested in community work projects, and/or surveys and research.

Many students attending other colleges throughout Georgia, particularly the University of Georgia, expresses interest in expanding the organization on a state-wide basis. The organization did become state-wide. They held a conference and started work on specific programs. However, when the year ended many of the officers and members graduated and the organization became inactive.

Now, in 1966, Georgia students are again feeling the need for the GSHR. Georgia students are seeing the Georgia Students for Human Rights as a way to step toward progress and moderation.

Why have a state-wide organization? A state-wide organization is valuable on three levels: the state, the region and the campus.

State-wide, the organization could serve to coordinate activities. For example, "Operation Search," a program to recruit capable people to attend college, could be initiated or a program to assist poor people in making application for welfare or related programs could be run by students. The state-wide functions could also include publishing a newsletter.

On a regional level, the program could include exchanges between campuses in an area, as well as work on employment or school desegregation problems.

At the campus level, the group could work on specific campus issues such as, academic freedom, university reform, etc. and benefit from ideas and techniques used on various campuses.

Is there a need for such an organization? Many Georgians, both adult and students, say, "yes." They feel that in 1966, the need for students to work for better human relations is as great as, if not greater than in past years.

Are Georgia students willing to work with such an organization? To be frank we don't know. Therefore, we are writing you on behalf on the many people, across the State who have expressed an interest. Enclosed is a response sheet on which we are requesting that you tell us what you think about the GSHR.

Thank you

Sincerely,

From: David S. Seeley, Director
Equal Educational Opportunities Program

Subject: Grants to School Boards to Assist in Dealing with Problems Incident to Desegregation

In accordance with your request, we are forwarding the enclosed policies and procedures guide concerning grants to school boards as authorized by Section 405 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Although this guide has not yet received final clearance it is a temporary working document and may be used in developing a draft proposal, as few changes are anticipated. An approved copy will be mailed as soon as it is available.

If a college or university in your area is considering an institute on problems of desegregation, it might prove advantageous for you to contact them about mutual concerns and the possibility of cooperative planning. Since the supply of policies and procedures guides for the conduct of institutes is limited, we are presently unable to include them for the public school personnel who requested these manuals. The manuals will be provided in these cases, but at a later date. Similarly, requests for institute schedules and lists of available materials will be filled as these items are developed.

You will note that grants to school boards are available for: (1) the in-service training of school personnel, (2) the employment of advisory specialists, or (3) a combination of both approaches. Details for completing proposals according to the types of assistance desired are contained in Parts A and B of the manual.

Applications for grants will be processed and reviewed as they are received, and it is anticipated that subsequent notification of the determination made with respect to each proposal will be forthcoming within approximately one month from the date of receipt of the application.

If you wish to contact this Office regarding any aspect of your proposal, you may direct correspondence to us at the following address:

A BRIEF EXPLANATION OF "MEDICARE"

HEALTH INSURANCE FOR THE AGED

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE
SOCIAL SECURITY ADMINISTRATION

HEALTH INSURANCE FOR THE AGED

The 1965 social security amendments, which were signed into law by President Johnson on July 30, establish a broad program of health insurance, known popularly as "medicare," for people 65 or older. This program is important for persons now working, for they will have this protection in later years. But if you are already 65, or will reach that age soon, you especially will want to have the information this leaflet provides on how these health insurance programs will protect you when they start in July 1966.

TWO KINDS OF HEALTH INSURANCE

- Hospital Insurance—to help pay the bills when you are hospitalized. The program also provides payments for skilled nursing care and other services in an extended care facility after hospitalization, outpatient hospital diagnostic services, and home health services.

  This insurance is financed out of special contributions paid by people while they work, with matching contributions from employers, so that people will not have to pay for this protection when they are old and not working.

- Medical Insurance—to help you pay the bills for doctors' services and for a number of other medical items and services not covered under the hospital insurance program.

  The medical insurance program is voluntary. You decide whether to enroll for protection under the medical insurance program. You can have this important added protection at a low cost ($3 monthly) because the Federal Government will pay an equal amount toward the cost.

HOW PEOPLE 65 AND OVER QUALIFY

Most people will not have to go to the social security office to qualify for protection under the hospital and medical insurance programs.

You will not need to go to your social security office if—

- you are getting social security or railroad retirement benefits. You qualify automatically for hospital insurance, and an application card for medical insurance benefits will be mailed to you by December 1965 with a leaflet explaining both of these programs.
- you are receiving a Federal civil service retirement annuity. You will get further information by mail. You will be told if it is necessary to go to the social security office later.
- you are receiving public assistance payments. In most cases, the public assistance agency will assist you in applying for hospital insurance and will advise you about enrolling for medical insurance.

You should go to your social security office if you are not receiving any of the above payments and

- you have worked under social security but have never applied for benefits. The people in your social security office will help you apply for hospital insurance. They will also advise you on how you can enroll in the medical insurance program.
- you have never worked under social security. Get in touch with your social security office between September 1, 1965, and March 31, 1966.

HOSPITAL INSURANCE

Nearly every[1] American 65 or over will be protected under the hospital insurance program when it starts in July 1966. If you qualify, these are the benefits for which you will be eligible:

Hospitalization for up to 90 days in a "spell of illness"[2]—the program pays for covered services during 60 days of care in a participating hospital, except for the first $40, during a spell of illness. If you are hospitalized for more than 60 days during your spell of illness, the program will pay all but $10 daily for covered services during an additional 30 days of care.

There is a lifetime limitation of 190 days on payments for treatment in mental hospitals.

Outpatient Hospital Diagnostic Services—the program will pay 80 percent of the cost for diagnostic services you receive as an outpatient of a participating hospital during a 20-day period, except for the first $20 for each 20-day period.

[1] Some Federal employees and former Federal employees who are not eligible for social security benefits are not eligible for hospital insurance. They may, however, enroll in the medical insurance program.

Aliens who are not eligible for social security cash benefits will be eligible for the hospital and medical insurance programs only if they were admitted to the United States for permanent residence and have resided continuously in the United States for 5 years.

[2] A "spell of illness" begins on the first day you receive covered services as a patient in a hospital or extended care facility. It ends after you have been out of a hospital or extended care facility for 60 consecutive days. You may be discharged and readmitted several times during a spell of illness, but a new spell of illness cannot begin until you have been out of a hospital or extended care facility for 60 consecutive days.

Posthospital Extended Care in the kind of skilled nursing home or part of a hospital which qualifies as an extended care facility—after a hospital stay of at least 3 days, the program pays for 20 days of extended care during a spell of illness. If you need this care for more than 20 days during a spell of illness, the program will pay all but $5 daily for an additional 80 days.

Posthospital Home Health Care Services—the program will pay the cost of up to 100 visits in the 365 days after your discharge from a hospital after a stay of 3 days or more or from an extended care facility, if these services are furnished under an approved plan. Services of visiting nurses, physical therapists, and other health workers (but not doctors) who come to your home to furnish health care services are covered. Doctor's visits are covered only under the voluntary medical insurance plan.

Covered Services in a Hospital or Extended Care Facility—benefit payments will cover (except for the deductible amounts) the cost of your room and board in semiprivate accommodations, ordinary nursing services, and the costs of drugs, supplies, and most other items of service you receive which are customarily furnished for the care of patients by the hospital or extended care facility.

Effective Dates—the benefits described above will become payable beginning July 1, 1966, except for posthospital extended care benefits which start on January 1, 1967.

SUPPLEMENTARY MEDICAL INSURANCE

The hospital insurance program will help you pay your hospital bills, but it does not pay doctor bills. You can provide in advance toward paying your doctor bills by signing up for medical insurance.

After you enroll for medical insurance, you pay a small premium ($3 monthly) with the Federal Government matching this amount.

The medical insurance program pays 80 percent of the reasonable charges for covered services, except for the first $50 in a calendar year.

Since the program does not begin until July 1, 1966, no expenses you have before that time can count toward the $50 for 1966.

The services covered under medical insurance include:

- Physicians' and Surgeons' Services: no matter where you receive the services—at home, in the doctor's office, in a clinic, or in a hospital.
- Home Health Visits: up to 100 home health visits under an approved plan each year with no need for prior hospitalization. This is in addition to the 100 visits you get under hospital insurance.
- Other Medical and Health Services regardless of where rendered: including such things as diagnostic tests (X-rays, etc.; laboratory services); X-ray or radium treatments; surgical dressings, splints, casts; certain ambulance services; braces, artificial legs, arms, and eyes; rental of medical equipment such as iron lungs; and many other medical items and services.

The voluntary medical insurance plan becomes effective starting July 1, 1966. If you enroll in time, your medical insurance coverage will start on that day. The medical insurance program will not, of course, pay for any goods or services you receive before July 1966.

When You Can Enroll For Medical Insurance

The law provides specific periods of time, called enrollment periods, during which you can sign up for medical insurance benefits. The first enrollment period begins on September 1, 1965, and ends on March 31, 1966. As noted previously, people who are entitled to social security, railroad retirement, or civil service benefits will get their application cards by mail.

If you are 65 or older on January 1, 1966, you must sign up during the first enrollment period in order to be covered under the medical insurance program when it starts in July 1966. Remember, the first enrollment period ends on March 31, 1966.

If your 65th birthday occurs after January 1, 1966, your first enrollment period runs for 7 months beginning with the third month immediately before the month you reach 65, and ending 3 months after the month you are 65. For example, if you reach 65 in February, you may sign up any time between the preceding November 1 and the following May 31.

You will have protection as soon as you reach 65 only if you apply during the 3-month period just before the month in which you reach 65. Your medical insurance will not take effect before July 1, 1966.

What You Will Lose If You Enroll Late

There are several good reasons for signing up for the medical insurance program during your first enrollment period.

If you pass up your first opportunity, you will not have another chance to sign up until the next general enrollment period (October 1, 1967 to December 31, 1967). Also, if you wait to enroll, you may have to pay a higher premium for the same protection, and your coverage will not begin until 6 to 9 months after you enroll.

These provisions take into account the higher cost of insuring a person who does not enroll and begin paying premiums at his first opportunity.

Paying The Monthly Premium

If you join the voluntary plan and you are receiving monthly social security benefits or a railroad or civil service retirement annuity, $3 a month for medical insurance benefits will be deducted from your check each month. No deductions will be made before July 1966.

If you are not eligible for social security checks for one or more months, arrangements will be made for you to make the $3 payments in a convenient manner.

If you are not receiving any of these benefits, you will get information when you enroll about how to pay the monthly premiums when you enroll or soon afterward.

YOUR HEALTH INSURANCE CARD

After you qualify for the hospital insurance program you will receive a health insurance card by mail. If you enroll in the medical insurance program, your card will show that you have both medical and hospital insurance.

After June 1966, whenever you use any of the services which are covered, show your health insurance card to the hospital, extended care facility, home health agency, doctor, or other person providing the services. The part of the bills for which payment can be made will then be taken care of by the program.

Services Not Covered By Health Insurance

The hospital insurance plan gives you basic protection against the high cost of illness in old age, but it will not pay all of your health care bills. For example, physicians' and surgeons' services, including the services of pathologists, radiologists, and anesthesiologists in the hospital, are not covered by the hospital insurance plan. (If you enroll under the voluntary medical insurance plan, that plan will help toward paying your doctor bills.)

Some items and services are not covered under either plan: routine physical checkups, eyeglasses, hearing aids, private duty nurses, custodial care, and personal services such as a telephone or television in your hospital room.

Under the hospital insurance program, drugs are covered only when they are furnished to a patient in a hospital or extended care facility. Under the medical insurance program, drugs are covered only when they are administered by a physician and cannot be self-administered.

Payments will ordinarily be made under the program only in the 50 States, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, Guam, and American Samoa. Hospital services under the basic hospital insurance plan may be provided in border areas immediately outside the United States if comparable services are not accessible in the United States for a beneficiary who becomes ill or is injured in this country.

HOW THE HOSPITAL AND MEDICAL INSURANCE PLANS WILL BE FINANCED

The financing provisions for hospital and medical insurance are separated completely from the financing provisions of the regular social security program.

The hospital insurance program will be financed by special contributions from employees and self-employed people. Employers will pay a like amount. For each, the hospital insurance contribution rate will be 0.35 percent in 1966 on the first $6,600 of earnings. Thus, a worker who earns $4,000 yearly will pay $14 in 1966. In 1967, the rate will be 0.5 percent. Thus the worker with $4,000 earnings will pay $20 in 1967. The contribution rate is scheduled to increase periodically until 1987, so that in 1987 a worker will pay $32 yearly on $4,000 earnings. On the maximum earnings of $6,600 yearly, a worker will pay $23.10 in 1966, $33.00 in 1967, and $52.80 in 1987 and thereafter.

The hospital insurance contributions will be in addition to, and collected at the same time and in the same manner as the regular social security contributions. Income from the hospital insurance contributions will be put into the Hospital Insurance Trust Fund from which the program's benefits and administrative costs will be paid. (A special provision was included in the law to reimburse the Hospital Insurance Trust Fund from general tax revenues for the costs of providing hospital insurance coverage for the 2 million people who are not entitled to monthly social security or railroad retirement benefits.)

The medical insurance program will be financed through monthly premiums paid by people over 65 who enroll in the program and by matching payments from the Federal Government from general revenues. Income from the medical insurance premiums and the matching Federal payments will be put into the Supplementary Medical Insurance Trust Fund, and the benefits and administrative expenses of medical insurance will be paid from this fund.

At least until 1968, the monthly premium (and the matching Federal payment) will be $3 for each person who chooses coverage. The law requires that the premium rates be examined every 2 years starting in 1967. If the premium rate, including the government's share, is not enough to cover the cost of the program for the next two years, the rate may be changed. The government will continue to pay half the cost.

When you enroll for medical insurance, you are not under any obligation to continue it beyond the end of the next odd-numbered year. Thus, if there is at any time an increase in the premium rate, you will at the same time have an opportunity to drop out of the program if you wish.

Late Enrollment And Re-Enrollment

If you do not enroll at your first opportunity, you may enroll later, but only during certain periods. These periods are the last three months of odd-numbered years beginning with 1967.

If your premiums are being deducted from your social security benefits and you decide to drop out of the medical insurance program, you may drop out during an enrollment period. If you are paying your premiums in cash, your enrollment may be ended if you fail to pay the premiums.

If your enrollment is ended, you may re-enroll once, but only during one of the enrollment periods and only if you re-enroll within three years.

IF YOU CANNOT MEET YOUR MEDICAL EXPENSES

The health insurance programs will pay a large part of the cost of health care for most older people, but they do not pay the entire bill. If you have medical expenses you are not able to pay, you may qualify for aid from your public welfare agency. Most States have medical care programs for aged people who cannot pay their medical bills, and the 1965 Amendments make it possible for the States to strengthen and improve these services. Your public welfare agency may be able to help you.

FOR FURTHER INFORMATION

For more detailed information about the new health insurance plans, call, write, or visit your nearest social security district office.

Do not because of this new law cancel any hospital or medical insurance you may now have. The health insurance provisions of the new law give no protection whatsoever until July 1966.

Dear Mr. Stanfield:

Thank you very much for your support of Mr. Stanley Kruger and his work as area director for Georgia, Florida and South Carolina.

I appreciate your taking your time to write to us. It is a thoughtful and generous gesture.

We, too, feel Mr. Kruger has done a good job in an extremely sensitive area, and we have a high regard for his abilities. The unit he will now be heading, as you know, deals with grants and institutes to help school districts with desegregation problems. This program has not received as much publicity as has Title VI, but, in our opinion, is in many ways more significant than our Title VI activities. Mr. Kruger was acting head of a similar unit before, and that program at the moment is badly in need of being strengthened. We are very hopeful that reestablishing this unit will help us improve the Title IV program.

Thank you again for writing and for your interest in our program.

Sincerely yours,

Harold Howe II
U.S. Commissioner of Education

FOR RELEASE UPON DELIVERY

Statement of
Harold Howe II
U.S. Commissioner of Education
Department of Health, Education, and Welfare
Before the Committee on Rules of the House of Representatives
Friday, September 30, 1966
10:30 a.m., EDT

The Commissioner is accompanied by:

Mr. St. John Barrett, Second Assistant to the Assistant Attorney General, Civil Rights Division, Department of Justice

Mr. Peter Libassi, Special Assistant to the Secretary for Civil Rights, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee:

In 1954, more than a decade ago, the Supreme Court declared segregated public schools to be unconstitutional. The Court concluded that segregated education is inherently unequal, and that "in the field of public education the doctrine of separate but equal has no place." In the following term the Court did not direct that the schools be desegregated forthwith, but rather with "all deliberate speed."

Ten years later, many schools were still being operated on a segregated basis. It was in this context that in July 1964 Congress enacted Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. That Title expressly requires all Federal agencies, including the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, to assure that no person be subjected to discrimination under any program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance. This law obliges the Department to withhold Federal funds from any school system that continues to maintain a segregated school. It was in order to discharge this responsibility that we issued the Guidelines and established the appropriate administrative machinery for enforcing them.

The school desegregation guidelines were issued by the Office of Education to provide an objective basis for carrying out our obligations under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Not only did local school districts request consistent guides to assist them in undertaking their obligations, but the Office of Education required a policy statement to assist in administration of a large program. The fundamental principles of the guidelines are based upon the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and upon court decisions. The courts have said, for example: that faculty desegregation is a necessary element of school desegregation; that free-choice plans must work fairly; and that school boards have an obligation to work affirmatively to achieve desegregation. The guidelines articulate the basic principles already enunciated by the courts and the way they apply to the broad administrative responsibility of the Office of Education.

As a brief summary we would call attention to the following points:

1. The guidelines were developed to meet the needs of the schools for a statement concerning their obligations under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act. The primary purpose of the guidelines and of our administration of Title VI is to help school districts to stay in compliance so that Federal funds may flow to the benefit of school children.

2. Our own attorneys in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare and those in the Justice Department were asked to examine the guidelines prior to their issuance in March 1966 to determine whether they are consistent with Title VI. These attorneys have agreed that the guidelines are consistent with Title VI and follow the Federal Court rulings.

3. The Courts have pointed out that as long as school staffs are still assigned on a segregated basis the existence of the Negro school and the white school as separate parts of a dual school system cannot be overcome.

4. The guidelines do not mention and do not require "racial balance" or the correction of racial "imbalance." Nor have we in the administration of our obligations under Title VI sought to establish "racial balance." They deal only with desegregation plans designed to eliminate the dual school systems for whites and Negroes, systems being operated in violation of the 1954 Supreme Court Ruling.

In response to questions which have arisen over the past few months concerning the legality, the purpose, and the operation of the 1966 School Desegregation Guidelines, we prepared a special statement which the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, John Gardner, sent on April 9, 1966, as a letter to Congressmen and Governors.

What the letter said was this:

> We have received a number of inquiries about our revised school desegregation guidelines, some of which reflect a misunderstanding of their purpose and intent. You will probably have received similar inquiries, so I think it might be useful to restate the purpose, background, and meaning of the revised guidelines.
>
> For the same reason, I have asked U.S. Commissioner of Education Harold Howe II and senior members of his staff to meet with State and local school officials to make clear the purpose and nature of these revised guidelines.
> The Courts and the Congress have spoken clearly on the basic issue of the desegregation of public schools. The Supreme Court decided that question twelve years ago. Since then Congress has plainly established in law that pupils may not be assigned to schools on the basis of their race or color. Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 expressly requires the Executive Branch to insure that funds for federally assisted programs, including education, must not be used to support discrimination or segregation.
> This Department, like all other executive agencies, is required by Title VI not to use Federal funds to perpetuate racial segregation. We have found that uniform rules contained in guidelines issued by the Commissioner of Education are the best method of dealing with both the operational problems of school districts and our own responsibilities under the law.
> The first school guidelines were issued in April, 1965, and they were not widely questioned. There was a widespread effort by school districts to comply. In many areas, school desegregation began for the first time smoothly and without incident. In other areas, desegregation, already begun, progressed substantially.

From the experience under the original guidelines, we learned that effective desegregation depends on determination by local communities. The guidelines did not ask school districts formerly segregated to desegregate overnight. They recognized that the remedy to be fashioned should take into account administrative problems. Thus, they asked that a substantial beginning be made; and this was done. All but 300 of the more than 2,000 affected school districts agreed to desegregate all 12 grades by the fall of 1966, a full year ahead of the 1967 target contemplated by the original guidelines and required by the Courts. Only 79 chose not to comply.

The legal principle, defined by the Courts, is that desegregation must progress, and that as it proceeds in a particular school district, administrative problems offer progressively less justification for delay. During 1965 and this year, the Courts repeatedly announced requirements which put school districts further along the road toward desegregation than did the original guidelines. This was a foreseeable and inevitable result, since the guidelines were of general applicability while Courts fashioned their orders on a case-by-case basis.

From the issuance of revised Court orders it became clear that school districts not operating under Court orders could and should make more progress this year toward desegregation than was required by the original guidelines. In light of this fact and of our experience with problems under free choice plans for compliance, we revised the guidelines.

One aspect of the revised guidelines about which there has been some inquiry is faculty desegregation. Courts have held that meaningful desegregation cannot occur so long as segregation of faculty members persists. The 1965 guidelines pointed toward faculty desegregation by asking school boards to hold desegregated staff meetings and to plan further steps the ensuing year. The 1966 guidelines, following the decisions of Courts, provide for desegregation of the faculty to begin.

The guidelines do not, as some have assumed, require the instantaneous desegregation of the faculty in every school building in every district. Nor do they prescribe rigid means. They provide considerable flexibility as to how a district might undertake faculty desegregation. What the guidelines do require is that a reasonable beginning be made and that reasonable progress be achieved beyond what was achieved last year. We believe that, with determination and good faith, these goals can be attained.

The second area of concern involves the percentages mentioned in the guidelines. Some have contended that this portion of the guidelines imposes a formula of "racial balance." This contention misconceives the purpose of the percentages.

The prevailing method of desegregation is what is called the "free choice" plan. Under such a plan, students select their schools instead of being assigned to them on a geographic basis. Courts have expressly conditioned their approval of such plans on affirmative action by school boards to insure that "free choice" actually exists. It is our responsibility to review such plans to insure that the choice is, in fact, free and to indicate to school districts what procedures should be used to assure true freedom of choice.

In seeking appropriate criteria to guide us in review of free choice plans, we have adopted the objective criteria applied by the Courts in similar situations. One such criterion is the distribution of students by race in the various schools of a system after the students have made their choices. If substantial numbers of Negro children choose and go to previously all-white schools, the choice system is clearly operating freely. If few or none choose to do so in a community where there has been a pattern of segregation, then it is appropriate that the free choice plan be reviewed and other factors considered to determine whether the system is operating freely.

With more than 2000 separate districts to consider, such percentages are thus an administrative guide which helps us to determine those districts requiring further review. Such review in turn will determine whether or not the freedom of choice plan is in fact working fairly.

If the purposes of the guidelines and their relationship to the decision of the Courts and the laws of the Congress are understood, I believe our general aim also will be clear. It is to assist local officials to comply with the law in good faith and to enable us to fulfill our responsibilities in administering Title VI.

Sincerely,

/s/ John W. Gardner
Secretary

Mr. Chairman, there are just two additional topics I would like to mention. The first has to do with Office of Education administration of its obligations under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act. In this connection we would make the following points:

1. The purpose of our administrative activities is to help school districts to get into compliance and avoid any issue of loss of funds.

2. As of September 26, there were 37 school districts which had lost all Federal funds because of failure to submit an acceptable desegregation plan. There are an additional 73 districts which have been cited for hearings and which may lose their funds if the rulings of Federal examiners go against them. Approximately 2,000 school districts, which formerly maintained dual school systems, are receiving funds as the result of using the compliance procedures.

3. We have attempted to focus the attention of our small staff on those districts which have had the greatest problems with making their free-choice plans operate effectively. We have deferred the award of new funds to some 70 of these districts, but they continue to receive money for programs already approved. This deferral of funds follows a procedure established by the Attorney General.

Secondly, I would like to mention that we have received substantial help in our school desegregation efforts from State and local officials. The State of Florida provides an example. Two years ago, less than 3 percent of all Florida Negro children attended school with whites. Last year, the percentage had risen almost 10 percent, and it is estimated that this year it will reach close to 20 percent. Such a significant increase is due in no small part to the acceptance by the State educational agency of a constructive role in eliminating Florida's dual system of schools as rapidly as possible.

Wherever possible, the Office of Education tries to decentralize administrative responsibility for desegregation so that those who make the initial decisions are in close contact with local school officials. We also seek to strengthen the capabilities of existing State and local educational a .cies for providing assistance and leadership. A Title IV grant has been made to the Florida educational agency to establish a full-time unit of 10 people, working at the State level, to help local schools with desegregation problems. Similar units have now also been established in other Southern and border States--Georgia, Tennessee, Delaware, and Maryland.

Finally let me say that any school district that is not in compliance with the provisions of the Civil Rights Act seems to us to represent a defeat. It means failure on our part and failure on the part of those responsible for the schools. Our failure arises from our inability to be of sufficient help in achieving voluntary compliance. The failure of the schools arises from some combination of local conditions that threatens the opportunities of all children to receive the best possible education. We are seeking always to be fair and just. Our legal responsibility is clear--to adhere to the procedures and policies established in the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and supported by the decisions of the Federal courts.

(See also Attached Sept. 27 statement)

October 11, 1966

TO: Pat Watters
FROM: Ed Stanfield

Pursuant to our brief conversation Monday afternoon:

It seems to me that we need to stress as an incidental part of many of our studies and publications or in a special report or -- preferrably-- in both ways the far-reaching, unfortunate implications of the emasculation of Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 which is now taking place. I think the subject would be worthy of a special report. (You might call it "The Life and Hard Times of Title VI" or the "Rise and Fall of the Federal Resolve.")

Among the points which need to be made:

(1) Administrative procedures against de facto segregation in schools was the strongest hope, if not the only one, Negroes had of overcoming the pattern and custom of segregated schools in the South.

(2) Much of what little belief Negroes had in the civil rights determination of the federal government was riding on Title VI. The administration stands to lose (further) the confidence of Negroes.

(3) While most of the furor has been over school and hospital desegregation policies of H.E.W., the loss of Title VI means the loss of what little leverage we have to secure equal participation for Negroes in agriculture extension services, ASCS (crop allotment) elections, and other programs of the Department of Agriculture (which is notoriously white-dominated and corrupt); in O.E.O. local policy boards; in housing programs (which probably means the loss of the one slim hope of overcoming segregated housing patterns).

See the article by Herbers in the NYT of October 7 or 8 which was excerpted in the Journal-Constitution, October 9. The gist was that Congress and the administration are slowly undermining Title VI.

Sen. Russell said when the 1964 C. R. Bill was being debated that its heart was Title VI -- and that segregationist knows his oats.

We or somebody ought to be raising hell about its demise.

Some Officials Expect Repeal Of Title VI of Rights Act

TITLE VI AJ+C 10/9/66

By JOHN HERBERS

(Copyright 1965 by the New York Times Co.)

WASHINGTON, Oct. 8 — Some administration officials are concerned that the most far-reaching desegregation law —Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 — is in danger of repeal — bit by bit.

Both houses of Congress have been chipping away at Title VI, which is intended to prohibit racial discrimination in any federally assisted program.

"Now when we call on Southern school officials for compliance, they just laugh at us," an official in the office of education said. "They feel they have the rest of the country on their side now."

On Thursday, the House voted, 220 to 116, to require a hearing before the Office of Education can delay sending federal funds to any school district suspected of practicing discrimination.

Both houses agreed to cut the civil rights enforcement appropriation to the Department of Health, Education and Welfare by $927,000. These actions are subject to approval in conference committee.

IN ADDITION, the department and the commissioner of education, Harold Howe II, have been criticized by members of Congress, from both the South and North, who say the department is going beyond the law in enforcement of Title VI.

Some officials within the department believe that damage done to Title VI so far is more psychological than substantative, although some officials in the administration believe Congress is not yet through with Title VI.

"A lot of people would like to see it repealed or gradually eroded away," one official said.

New opposition to Title VI is making a difficult enforcement task harder, a spokesman for HEW said.

If enforcement of Title VI followed every federal dollar, as it could, except for a few exemptions, it would be felt in almost all phases of life.

BUT THE administration has attempted to enforce it only in select programs, chiefly schools, hospitals, and the federal agencies.

Further, Title VI is not popular in the bureaucracy.

Many officials say privately they wish Title VI did not exist. It involves them in the emotional area of race relations they would rather avoid. And it distracts them from what they consider to be their major concerns because it carries the power to withhold funds.

The office of education is committed to integrated education. But some officials feel that civil rights problems have hindered the office's major job of building quality schools, whatever the racial balance.

In administering federal aid to secondary schools, the office has encountered complaints of "federal control" from all areas of the country, partly due, it is believed, to the side effects of Title VI enforcement.

THIS WEEK, Howe proposed before the House Rules Committee that enforcement of Title VI in school desegregation be delegated to the states. He said this could be incorporated in the general state administration of federal education programs, if the states wish to assume that responsibility.

The federal standards and guidelines would have to be maintained, Howe added.

Title VI has been enforced only in the South and border states. The office of education has made no attempt to enforce Title VI outside the South since last year when it deferred funds to Chicago and was overruled by the White House.

The reason for the general assault on Title VI now is that Southerners have mounted a campaign against it and many Northerners are sympathetic for the first time.

The main charge is that HEW is intent on achieving racial balance when the intent of the law is only to remove racial barriers.

HEW officials say that their desegregation guidelines actually permit a slower rate of integration than would have taken place without them.

"If we had just enforced Title VI outright," one official said, "they would have had to desegregate all at once instead of four grades a year. All we are trying to do is stop having Negro schools and white schools and just have schools."

Memo to Paul Anthony:

The school desegregation report should follow this basic outline:

I. Chronological detailing of reaction to the guides
   a. Pre-guidelines comments and preparations
   b. General nature of the guides
   c. Early acceptance by southern schoolmen and politicians
   d. Realization of aims of guidelines leading to resistance by schoolmen
   e. Politicians manipulating "white backlash"
   f. Letter from 18 southern senators and a comparison of it with the Southern Manifesto
   g. Outline of two most vociferous states
      1. Alabama
      2. Georgia
   h. Removal of compliance officers
      1. Mississippi
      2. Georgia-S.C.
      3. Alabama
   i. Senate appropriations committee hearings and results
   j. House judiciary sub-committee hearings and (hopefully) results
   k. Outlook--future of the guidelines.

II. Outline of significant court action pointing to the hoped-for acceptance by the Fifth Circuit of the guidelines as criteria for court-ordered desegregation.
   1. Jackson
   2. Mobile
   3. Alabama and Louisiana districts--pending
   4. Oklahoma City

III. Conclusions
   a. Comment on national standards in education. The nature of "quality education," which Negroes are willing to sacrifice so much for.
   b. Comment on the political situation and its portents for school desegregation.
   c. A general evaluation of the guidelines--on the basis of their effectiveness if they were followed to the letter. What about racial balance? Is faculty desegregation the final answer to removal of dual structure?
   d. Responsibility for failure of guidelines:
      1. Whole concept of school desegregation--especially on federal level and in the federal courts--allowing a debate on the legitimacy of desegregation twelve years after segregation has been declared illegal.

on deliberate speed —?

      2. Southern press (and a generally more responsible but complacent national press
      3. Southern moderates
         a. Acceptance of tokenism
         b. political disinterest and disaster
         c. Racial balance a threat to traditional alliance between upper class whites and Negroes
      4. Southern schoolmen--a frightened and devious lot
      5. Office of education ?
         a. In 1965--naive
         b. In 1966--a generally inept attempt at cracking down. Use of percentages as an "administrative guide" brought all the fuss about racial balance, which in turn brought congressional investigations
         c. Failure to back effective compliance officers--Kruger
      6. Presidential committment--not forthcoming. The Howard Universit speech and the like, but no evidence of any real pressure. Johnson has great skill in getting what he wants from Congress--why no effort to head off the appropriations committee action? Little real executive effort to back the guidelines--or those who are charged with enforcing them.
   e. General weakening in the national will. De jure being replaced in the South by de facto. North willing to accept de facto. Going back now to fighting for public schools again. Governor Johnson of Mississippi remarked that if the guidelines prevailed, there would be a new dual school system: private schools and federal schools.
   f. Outlook--grim.

Wilkins Critical of School Aid Change

By THOMAS A. JOHNSON

Roy Wilkins, executive director of the N.A.A.C.P., criticized yesterday an amendment to the school aid bill as "the latest and perhaps most devastating blow in the current campaign to destroy the civil rights advances of the last few years."

The Southern-sponsored amendment, passed in the House of Representatives on Thursday, would require a hearing before the Government could withhold funds from school districts that violated desegretation guidelines.

In a statement issued from his New York City office, the director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People said that the amendment "would make it impossible for the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, without protracted hearings, to withhold funds from schools that discriminate."

He added:

"It is an extension of the ongoing attack on the school desegregation guidelines and on Commissioner of Education Harold Howe 2d."

Mr. Withins, who also spoke for the 83-organization Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, which lobbies for rights legislation, called upon Congress, President Johnson and the American people for support.

He asked that Congress "defend their own laws and reject the crippling amendments of the last two weeks," that Mr. Johnson stand behind Mr. Howe and that the nation as a whole "recognize that nothing can create more disrespect for law than the vilification of public officials trying to uphold it."

The amendment, approved by a 113-to-63 nonrecorded vote, could be reversed by a roll-call vote.

Mr. Wilkins said that the recent attacks on Mr. Howe were aimed at getting rid of the commissioner because he had outspokenly called for compliance with the law.

Mr. Wilkins attacked as "thoroughly baseless" the recent statements that the Department of Health was too harsh in its administration of the guidelines and was moving too fast.

"When after 12 years only 8 per cent of the Southern schools are desegregated, no one can say we are going too fast," Mr. Wilkins said.

"And no one can say H. E. W. has pushed desegregation too vigorously, when despite widely documented violations, it has withheld funds from only 89 of 7,000 hospitals and 37 of 1,800 Southern school districts."

The civil rights leader predicted that if the amendment stood, it would bring about unwanted reactions from elements of both the Negro and white community.

"Its own [Congress's] abuse of the legislive process can only feed unrest and disillusionment among Negroes and spur the bigots of the North and the South to new excesses," he said.

The Administration had sought a $1.75-billion extension for the current fiscal year of the year-old program of aid to elementary and secondary schools.

The Senate passed on Thursday a bill that would authorize $6.4-billion for the next two years. Still in debate, however, is the House version, which is expected to authorize $5.8-billion over the same two-year period.

In a related matter, a spokesman for Mr. Wilkins declined to comment yesterday on the activities of militant young N.A.A.C.P. officials in Milwaukee, pending a special meeting between Mr. Wilkins, officials of the Fraternal Order of Eagles and the youts on Oct. 19th.

The N.A.A.C.P. Youth Council has picketed the homes of officials who belonged to the all-white organization.

In recent days, council members have been sitting in cars outside the homes of police officials. They say that the police have been maintaining a similar and unnecessary watc on their headquarters.

MEDICARE INSURANCE FOR PEOPLE OVER 65

The new MEDICARE program for persons 65 or over begins July 1, 1966. The Hospital Care program will provide almost free care in the hospital and after you leave the hospital. The kinds of care and the costs that are covered are described more fully below. In addition, there is a Medical Insurance program that will help pay your doctor's bills. (Doctor's bills are a separate cost to you, even while you are in a hospital.) If you want to get this Medical Insurance coverage, you must register by March 31, 1966.

Who must register:

1. For Hospital Care. If you are over 65 and you are not getting Social Security or railroad retirement benefits, register at your nearest Social Security Office. (A list of addresses is enclosed.) If you are 65 or over and you are receiving Social Security or railroad retirement benefits, you will automatically be covered under the Hospital Care program, and you do not need to register. If you are younger than 65 years old, register with your district office as soon as you reach 65.

2. For Medical Insurance. EVERYONE must register separately for this program. You must register for Medical Insurance even if you are covered under the Hospital Care program, and you must register by March 31, 1966.

How to register for Medical Insurance: If you have not yet filled out an application form for Medical Insurance, you should write immediately, before March 31, to the Social Security office nearest you. Say that you want to apply for MEDICARE. Your letter is not the same as the application form, but it lets the Social Security office know that you want to apply for Medical Insurance. They will send you an application form, and you must fill it out and send it back. Even if you cannot send back the application form before March 31, you will still qualify for Medical Insurance if you have sent in your short letter before March 31, 1966. If you do not do this by March 31, you will have to wait a year and a half for another chance to register. You will have to pay a higher premium, and you will have to wait longer before you are actually covered under the Medical Insurance.

In order to qualify for MEDICARE benefits, you do not need to have ever been covered before under Social Security, and you do not have to stop working. But you do need to be registered.

Here is a short description of the two MEDICARE programs:

1. Hospital Care Program

Hospital Care in the Hospital: You pay the first $40 of hospital bills, and the program will pay the rest for 60 days. If you need to be in the hospital more than 60 days, you will then pay $10 a day, and the program will pay the rest for another 30 days. If you leave the hospital and find later that you must return, you will still be covered. If you return to the hospital within 60 days from the time you left, you can receive hospital care up to the full 90 days. If you return to the hospital after 60 days from the time you left, you will again have to pay the first $40 of hospital bills.

Home Health Care after You Have Been in a Hospital: If you have been in a hospital (or a nursing home) for 3 or more days, you may receive 100 free home health care visits any time within one year after you have left the hospital. These visits could provide certain kinds of nursing care, therapy, and other services that will help you recover from your illness.

Outpatient Hospital Services: You are called an "outpatient" when you go to a hospital for certain kinds of services but you do not stay there, just as you might visit a doctor's office. For these outpatient services such as medical examinations and tests, you pay the first $20, and the program pays all other costs for a period of 20 days. After 20 days, you can still receive services but you must pay $20 again.

Extended Care after You Have Been in a Hospital: This part of the program begins on January 1, 1967. If you have been in a hospital for at least 3 days, you may receive 20 days of extended care at a skilled nursing home after you leave the hospital. This service is available to you within 14 days after you leave the hospital. The first 20 days are free. If you need additional care, you will then pay $5 a day and the program will pay the rest for another 80 days.

Services Covered in a Hospital or in a Facility for Extended Care

You do not have to pay anything to register for the Hospital Care program, but you must register if you are not going to be automatically covered (see other side, under "Who must register"). When you become sick and need hospital care, you must pay only the small amounts listed after each type of service (see other side), and the program will pay the rest of the costs for the number of days listed. The program's payments will cover the following kinds of expenses: the cost of your room and board in a semi-private room, ordinary nursing services, the cost of drugs, supplies, and most other kinds of service that hospitals usually provide. The Hospital Care program does not cover the cost of doctor's bills. The Medical Insurance program described below will help you pay for these bills and some other services.

2. Medical Insurance Program

This Medical Insurance program costs you only $3 a month. You must register for this program (see other side).

This program covers 80% of the costs of the three services listed below, but in any year from January 1 to December 31, you must pay the first $50. This $50 may go for any combination of the three services.

Physicians' and Surgeons' Services: Coverage is for all physicians' and surgeons' services that you receive at home, in a hospital or clinic, or at the doctor's office.

Home Health Visits: You may receive up to 100 home health visits each year, under an approved plan. In this part of the program, you do not need to have been in a hospital, and these visits are in addition to the 100 visits you get under the Hospital Care program.

Other Medical and Health Services: The following services are covered, no matter where you receive them: diagnostic tests (X-rays, laboratory services), X-ray or radium treatments, surgical dressings, splints or casts, certain ambulance services, braces, artificial legs, arms, or eyes, rental of medical equipment such as iron lungs, and many other medical items and services.

MATERNAL AND CHILD HEALTH SERVICE ANNUAL REPORT
JULY 1964 - JUNE 1965

The Maternal and Child Health Service is charged by law to protect and promote the health of mothers and children. The Service focuses upon those health factors which would help families to become economically independent members of society.

In 1964 there were 100,581 births of which 7,372 were home deliveries by 321 midwives. We can anticipate that 2,500 to 3,000 of these approximately 100,000 babies will be mentally retarded, of these 100 will be completely dependent and require institutional care, 400 will be semi-dependent, and 2,000 will be marginal dependent.

As late as 1934 the maternal death rate was 78.2 per 10,000 live births. In 1964 it was reduced to 4.7. Even though this is an astounding improvement, Georgia must materially improve both the maternal and infant mortality rates in order to compare favorably with the national average. In the last eight years there has been an alarming and persistent rising death rate among the one through eleven months age group. This has raised the infant mortality rate. Georgia ranks 45th among the states.

A majority of congenital defects, both mental and physical, are directly associated with the complications of pregnancy and heredity. Therefore, primary emphasis is placed upon promotion of family planning and good prenatal care, terminating in hospital delivery by a physician, and upon continuous well child supervision.

Maternal Care: During the year, 14,194 patients were admitted to prenatal medical care, 23,627 to prenatal nursing care, 3,873 to postnatal medical care. One hundred and six counties have maternal clinics with physicians' services.

As of June 14th the State Board of Health gave approval to a plan and policy for expanding the family planning program to include the more modern methods.

Well Child Care: Ninety-six counties have well child conferences with physicians in charge. There are nursing conferences in 17 other counties. In the one through four age range over 61,569 immunizations against diphtheria, tetanus and whooping cough were given. In this same age group almost 18,803 received oral polio vaccine. There are clinics in 163 towns and cities of Georgia.

Mental Retardation: More than 300 public health nurses from 114 counties over the state attended one of three regional Workshops on Mental Retardation held in 1965 in Atlanta, Albany, and Macon. After attending one of the workshops the nurse is then eligible to attend a one week course at Gracewood State School and Hospital which is taught by their staff.

There are two maternal and infant care projects for high risk prenatal patients, one located in Augusta, centered at the Medical College, and one in Atlanta, centered at Emory-Grady. There are two child development and evaluation centers, one located in Muscogee County, serving twelve counties, and the one in DeKalb serving two counties. A fifth special project in mental retardation, a child development and evaluation center in District #37 with a risk registry designed toward prevention and early detection has been accepted and funded by Children's Bureau as of July 1.

The voluntary hospital newborn screening program for phenylketonuria, a preventable cause of mental retardation, continues. Twenty-seven of the hospitals in Georgia screen babies born in the hospitals. Fourteen thousand three hundred and fifty-eight were tested last year. Two were found by this method and are being treated by dietary management. Three cases were found by urine tests on older children.

MEDICARE IMPACT: BEFORE AND AFTER

How Benefits to Start in July Will Help the Elderly Ill

By MARJORIE HUNTER

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 30 — He was an old man, living on a monthly $96 Social Security check, when he underwent an eye operaton.

The bill was $919; doctor's fee, $500; 10-day hospital stay, $419.

That was last year. Today, he is one of the millions of elderly Americans whose future medical bills will be paid, in large part, by the two Medicare insurance programs that go into effect July 1.

As in the case of all the estimated 18.5 million older Americans, 65 and over, he will be automatically entitled to benefits paying much of the costs of hospitalization, outpatient service and home nursing visits. And, effective next Jan. 1, he will be entitled to low-cost care in a nursing home or other extended care facility.

Because he has agreed to pay $3 a month—a sum to be matched by the Federal Government—he will have supplemental insurance covering a large part of his doctor's fees, diagnostic and therapy services and additional home nursing visits.

A Deadline Tonight

The deadline for enrolling in this supplementary insurance program is midnight tomorrow for those who turned 65 before last Jan. 1.

However, there are growing signs that Congress will extend the deadline. The decision will rest on a final tabulation on how many elderly Americans have signed up.

Administration officials estimate that more than 16 million persons have enrolled for the supplementary insurance, and one million others have turned it down. Republicans, seeking a deadline extension, assert that 5 million of the elderly have not been reached.

As one of those who have signed up, the old man who had the eye operation a year ago has, or will soon receive, a wallet-sized card that will be his passport to less expensive medical care.

New Cost of Operation

If he were to have an identical operation, at the same cost, after July 1, he would be billed just $180 instead of $919.

This is why:

Medicare's hospital insurance would pay for all but the first $40 of his 10-day stay. The cost to him: $40 instead of $419.

Under the supplementary medical insurance he has purchased through the Government, he would pay the first $50 of the doctor's fee, plus 20 per cent of the remainder. The cost to him: $140 instead of $500.

The old man with the $919 bill he could not afford is just one of thousands who have written to the Social Security Administration in recent years to explain their plight.

Another wrote:

"I had the misfortune to break my right leg. I had my own bone doctor [who charged] $400. I was only in the hospital 18 days. My bill was $851.51. I was not ill. I did not take any medicine at all. Bill in full, $1,251.51. I am paying it out at $10 a month. I am 80. They will take my home away from me if I miss a payment. I worked very hard for my little home. It would kill me I think if anything would happen to me so I could not keep on paying and paying."

$160 Bill Under Program

In this case, if it were to happen after July 1 and the man had both hospital and medical insurance, his total bill would be $160—hospitalization, $40; doctor's fee, $120.

But suppose, instead of an eye operation on a bone fracture, one of these two elderly men were to undergo two consecutive operations for cancer of the upper gastrointestinal tract after July 1. In this hypothetical case, the total bill might be $8,212. The cost to the patient: $1,651.

The hospital charge for 63 days, at $32 a day, would be $2,016. Hospital insurance would pay $1,946. The patient would be billed $40 for the first 60 days and $10 a day for the three additional days.

(The hospital insurance covers up to 90 days of hospitalization, with the patient billed $10 a day after 60 days.)

Other Benefits

Other charges — for laboratory tests, medications, recovery room, X-rays, electrocardiograms, blood transfusions, would be largely paid by one of the two insurance programs. The supplementary medical insurance also would pay a large part of the surgical and doctor fees.

Also, daily home visits by visiting nurses—in this case over a period of six weeks—would be fully covered by hospital insurance.

The fees of private duty nurses—an estimated total of $1,000—during the hospital stay would be billed to the patient. And the patient also would have to pay for medications taken before or after leaving the hospital.

If this long hospitalization were to end on or after next Jan. 1, the patient would be entitled to up to 100 days of care in a nursing home or other extended care facility.

He would not be required to pay anything for the first 20 days. For the next 80 days, he would be billed just $5 a day.

Midnight Is 1st Deadline For Medicare Sign-Ups

Persons who reached age 65 before last Jan. 1 must be enrolled by midnight tonight to qualify for benefits of the voluntary portion of the Medicare program, which will become effective next July 1.

Those who do not sign up by midnight can qualify if they notify by maid any of the city's 16 district offices of the Social Security Administration. Their intent to enroll must be postmarked by midnight. Those who fail to meet the deadline must wait until the three-month enrollment period beginning Oct. 1, 1967, and their benefits then would not start until July 1, 1968.

Persons reaching 65 after Jan. 1, 1966, must register in the seven-month period extending from three months before their birthday month to three months after it. If they fail to do so, they too will have to wait until the next enrollment period starting Oct. 1, 1967.

The long lines that formed at many of the district offices earlier this week tapered off yesterday and applications at the busiest offices were processed in little more than one hour, instead of up to two hours. The offices will be open today from 9 A. M. to midnight.

Longer Medicare Deadline Urged

AC 4/4/66

By GENE BERNHARDT

WASHINGTON (UPI)—President Lyndon B. Johnson asked Congress Thursday to extend for two months the deadline for persons over 65 to register for medical care for the aged insurance.

The White House estimated that by midnight, the present deadline, about 17 million persons will have signed up — approximately 90 per cent of the 19.1 million who are eligible.

Swift approval by Congress is expected for the President's request, which came as Social Security offices around the country were remaining open to handle a last-minute rush of applicants.

The supplemental insurance, which costs $3 a month, is a voluntary feature of the program. The old people automatically have hospital costs covered under the program.

In a letter transmitting his request to the House and Senate, Johnson said there had been "remarkable" results for "an energetic campaign to inform all citizens who are already 65 that they must enroll by March 31 to be eligible for medical insurance coverage.

He noted that more than 86 per cent of the 19.1 million eligible had actually signed up by Tuesday.

"Despite this enormous response, there will be some older citizens who will want to enroll after March 31 — because they did not act quickly enough, or because somehow they were not reached with news of this opportunity," Johnson said.

He pointed out that men and women over 65 could enroll after March 31 if they had "good cause" for failing to meet the deadline, but they would lose protection "for six months after enrollment." The insurance benefits start July 1.

"I believe it would be unfortunate to delay protection to these late enrollees — some of whom are those with the greatest need for medical insurance," Johnson said.

"Under my proposal, therefore, those enrolling in April and May would be eligible for protection on July 1 when the program goes into effect."

It was estimated earlier that 19.5 million Americans were eligible for the voluntary program which covers a major part of costs for surgery, visits and office calls by doctors, and other health services.

Some one million of those eligible notified the government in writing they were not interested in the program. Nearly 17 million others had registered before the deadline.

CITIZEN ACTION ASSEMBLY ON HEALTH & WELFARE SERVICES FOR GEORGIA'S CHILDREN

RESOLUTIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS, as follows, were set forth by the participants of the state-wide Citizen Action Assembly on Health and Welfare Services for Georgia's Children, April 1, 1966.

I. In considering welfare services, it is essential that we resolve to be aware and have concern for current programs, problem areas, and proposed changes in programs and legislation.

A. We resolve that the criteria for qualifying to receive Aid for Dependent Children (ADC) be re-evaluated to eliminate the high rigidity of requirements which deprive our children of basic essentials for their normal existence, and that steps be taken to increase the amount of the grants and the number of benefits (services).

B. We particularly recommend that the "substitute father" or "man in the house" clause be removed as a criteria for denying a family the right of assistance.

II. We recommend that the Georgia General Assembly be reconvened for the purpose of using surplus funds to increase health and welfare benefits; and that such benefits include the Georgia Department of Family and Children's Services launching a special project to distribute surplus foods, and that this Department increasingly use the Food Stamp Program as a more effective means of providing food to people in need.

III. We recommend that mandatory legislation be passed which will....

...require all school superintendents in all school districts to establish classes for retarded children, both educable and trainable, and that there be less rigidity in the accreditation of teachers for these special classes and an increase in the training of volunteer aides.

...establish a mechanism to insure the enforcement of child labor laws and practices throughout Georgia.

...insure enforcement of day care requirements at all centers in Georgia.

IV. We resolve that we be an Action Assembly and Committee, concerned with implementing and insuring adequate services towards improving the health and well-being of all children in Georgia, regardless of race, color, or creed.

A. To actively follow-up the groundwork laid by the Citizen Action Assembly:

1. Funds be sought and secured to develop a program which will bring services to those people most in need.

2. Upon receiving of funds, area meetings be held in the State, as the first phase of the Citizen Health and Welfare Program. These meetings will follow, in principle, the goals, purposes, and structuring of the State-wide Assembly.

3. An Advisory Board (Committee) be established to insure the fulfilling of program goals and plans, and that this Board be composed of a third civic leaders, a third representatives of communities in need, and a third professionals from public and private servicing agencies.

B. Upon establishing a state-wide structure, which will be composed of a state-wide committee with an advisory board, and area committees with boards and community delegates, we recommend the following programs:

1. Consultative services (public or private) be secured for community organizations requesting health and/or welfare programs.

2. Leaders of community organizations be encouraged to assist in educating the general public by interpreting health and welfare programs to their membership, encouraging volunteer service in areas of need, and devising means of disseminating information to the community-at-large.

3. Students should become aware of communities with health welfare problems; they should examine (research) services performed by local agencies, and, in general, analyze areas of need--geographical and problematic.

4. Young people should be motivated towards careers in public health and welfare, particularly in those areas in most need of trained personnel.

5. Local action should be taken to establish a community information center which would be responsible for....

   a) developing a community agency inventory for the purpose of coordinating and co-relating existing services and developing those additionally needed;

   b) devising an uptodate fact sheet on existing services and a means of disseminating this information;

   c) actively involving the people receiving services, and in most need of services, in the planning of methods for more efficient dispersing of services and in the planning for additionally needed services.

C. We recommend that, in cooperation with various citizen action groups in Georgia, public and private servicing agencies....

...examine their current procedures for distributing services, and, wherever feasible, devise means for simplifying procedures.

...make home services available or, where such servicing is not feasible, funds be available for those individuals who cannot present themselves to take advantage of services.

...consider decentralization and extension of services to improve the quality and quantity of services for those communities in need.

...provide the assistance of qualified personnel to train volunteers for services needing aides.

V. We resolve that we as individuals and representatives of our organizations will assume the responsibility for taking the above recommendations and resolutions to our respective communities, that we will actively participate in their implementation and in the elimination of all discriminatory practices existing in health and welfare servicing by public and and private agencies in Georgia.

With Federal Partnership—

Under the Hill-Burton Act the federal government has assisted local communities to build more than 2,000 clinics, public hospital and health and rehabilitation centers. Hospitals built with federal aid now provide more than 350,000 nursing home beds.

Most of the hospitals have been built in small towns and rural communities where there was, until the hospitals came, little medical care available. Hospitals may use additional legislation adopted in 1964 to modernize hospitals in larger cities.

Medicare will enable many persons to have medical care who could not before afford it. This will, of course, increase demand for hospital beds.

Since this is known, local authorities should be planning to increase bed and care capacities. It is not comfortable to think how badly off we would be in this nation had it not been for the partnership of the federal government in hospital and public health care.

Local Government

(Conversation: "What I want to know is when is the federal government going to leave things to local government. Why doesn't Washington let the states and the cities do what is needed? I get tired of all this welfare business. Let the churches and local charity take care of the poor and the sick. We used to do that before we let Washington take over.")

About three per cent of the babies born each year are clased in 1964 to modernize hospitals in larger cities.

Local Government

I get tired of all this welfare business. Let the churches and local charity take care of the poor and the sick. We used to do that before we let Washington take over.")

About three per cent of the babies born each year are classified as mentally retarded. About 4,000 of these are doomed to a lifetime of dependency. There are in this country today about 5.4 million Americans who are that classification. Their number will increase each year. The Maternal and Child Health and Mental Retardation Planning Amendments of 1963 provide a five-year program to assist states in planning comprehensive programs to cope with the increasing number of retarded children.

Since 1963 the number of special clinics for children has increased from 110 to 142. Scores of projects are underway, in partnership with the federal government, to lower the incidence of mental retardation caused by complications of pregnancy and birth. There are now some 5,000 teachers-in-training for mentally retarded and handicapped children.

Goldwater Vote

(Conversation: "I voted for Goldwater and I would do it again because I believe he would get the government out of things. I just don't like this welfare stuff.")

Illness and disability are burdens borne most heavily by the nation's lowest income groups.

Poor families and their children see a doctor less than half as often as do families with incomes of $7,000 and more annually. Last year, more than $1.3 million was spent on all public assistance medical care. Children made up to 60 per cent of the entire assistance caseload, yet they received only 12 per cent of the medical care benefits. The 1965 Social Security Amendments deal with this problem. It enables states to receive substantial federal participation in medical care for needy children under 21.

(Conversation: "Man, let me tell you this — nothing burns me up like this poverty program. Why don't the poor go to work. I'm a conservative because I don't believe in all this welfare help for people. They like being on welfare. Let them get out and get a job and support themselves.")

As the United States nears a population of 200,000,000 people the transition from rural to urban culture accelerates. Need for sharing some of the affluence with the less fortunate keeps the American system strong and flexible. Welfare, or a social conscience, is a necessary ingredient of change. That many citizens are so totally uninformed and in error about conditions in their own country testifies to their isolation from their own society.

Seeks to Calm Doctor Fears —Asks Self-Examination

HEALTH + WELFARE

By AUSTIN C. WEHRWEIN

Special to The New York Times

CHICAGO, June 28 — Dr. Charles L. Hudson, the new president of the American Medical Association, sought today to quiet fears about Medicare among doctors. He urged a "sound policy of self-examination" by the medical profession.

In sharp contrast to some emotional objections to Medicare by members of the A.M.A.'s policy-making House of Delegates, Dr. Hudson said he was convinced that with the advent of the Government's health care program for the aged, "we are not stepping off the brink into a bottomless pit of professional destruction and despair."

In his speech, he said doctors would face "insinuation and openly adverse criticism" after Medicare took effect, and he called Medicare "unneces-

MEDICARE PLANS SCORED BY G.O.P.

But Administration Asserts It Is Well Prepared

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, June 28—The Republican Coordinating Committee said today that the Administration had "failed tragically" to prepare for the start of the Medicare program.

The Administration, meanwhile, said it was well-prepared and did not foresee "major problems" of overcrowding.

These two views of Medicare's impact on the nation's medical facilities came less than three days before the program's start at 12:01 A.M. Friday. The G.O.P. view was expressed in a statement released here. The Administration presented its side in a briefing with reporters at the White House.

The briefing followed a private conference between President Johnson and his top advisers on Medicare, including John W. Gardner, Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare; Wilbur Cohen, department Under Secretary; Dr. William H. Stewart, Surgeon General of the Public Health Service; and Attorney General Nicholas deB. Katzenbach.

Noncompliance in South

Mr. Johnson was told that numerous Southern hospitals still had not been cleared for Medicare patients under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which is intended to ban racial discrimination in any federally assisted program.

Generally, however, compliance with Title VI among the nation's hospitals has improved markedly over the last few weeks. One report that Mr. Gardner gave the President showed 92.2 per cent of general hospital beds across the country had been certified to receive Medicare patients. Nearly all the hospitals that had not complied were in the South.

For example, the refusal of many Mississippi hospitals to abandon discriminatory practices means that only 26.6 per cent of hospital beds in that state are now available to elderly patients who are eligible for Medicare benefits.

Mississippi is the only state in complaince on less than 50 per cent of its beds. The figures for some other Southern states are: Georgia, 54.9; Louisiana, 57.2; Alabama, 66.1; South Carolina, 66.1.

The worst single instance of discrimination, Mr. Gardner told the President, is Mobile, Ala., where only 30 out of 3,986 beds—less than one per cent—will be available to Medicare patients.

In addition, Mr. Gardner listed Shreveport, La., and Jackson

sary." However, on the whole, his address was conciliatory, and at one point he declared that it was "wasteful of our collective professional energy to belabor the past."

Dr. Hudson, a 62-year-old internist at the Cleveland Clinic and a professor at Western Reserve University, set a course of "scientific objectivity" for the 214,000-member organization as a means of preventing extension of Medicare into a "national health service."

Although he discounted "drastic" changes for doctors under Medicare, he did, however, forecast new problems, among them a "reservoir of demand beyond our expectations" because of a supplementary Federal-state program for the needy already in effect.

Doctors, Dr. Hudson continued, must become "receptive to new ideas and become the leaders in experimentation in the mechanisms of medical practice."

Although the introduction of Medicare will be "uneven" and "probably vexatious at first and possibly even useful"

U.S. Hospitals Doubt Rush of Medicare Patients

By DONALD JANSON

Special to The New York Times

CHICAGO, June 25—With the start of Medicare on Friday, leading specialists are discounting predictions that hospitals will suddenly be overcrowded.

They cite national-occupancy averages to show that most hospitals have room for the expected increase in elderly patients. In hospitals already full, they say, increased demand will not mean the appearance of beds in corridors but simply that patients will go somewhere else or settle for a place on a waiting list.

Many persons of and over 65 years of age who are eligible for Federal benefits have postponed elective surgery until Medicare could pay for much of it. Forecasts of the increase in demand for hospital facilities have ranged up to 50 per cent.

"It will be more like 5 per cent," Dr. Edwin L. Crosby, director of the American Hospital Association, said in an interview.

The hospital association, with headquarters here, represents most of the approximately 7,000 hospitals that have applied to participate in Medicare.

Dr. Crosby's view appears to be the consensus among most other experts. The Department of Health, Education and Welfare agrees with the 5 per cent figure. So does the Blue Cross Association. So do leading hospital administrators.

Can Absorb Influx

Dr. Crosby said hospitals could absorb an influx of this proportion without undue strain.

"Average hospital occupancy is 75 per cent," he pointed out. "Optimum is 85 per cent. With Medicare, it will be 80, without any further ups and downs in the near future."

Walter J. McNerney, president of the Blue Cross Association, said only a few areas faced serious bed-shortage problems.

"In those places," he said, "there will be some queueing of persons who have put off elective surgery."

James E. Hague, editor of Hospitals, the journal of the American Hospital Association, said only 10 per cent of the nation's hospitals with 5 per cent of its beds would face demands too great to handle. All are operating at or near capacity now.

He said these included some prestigious hospitals in metropolitan areas and some small hospitals in rural areas. He said a survey showed that 88 counties, many of them in the Southeast, had full hospitals in the latter category.

Chicago Called Typical

The situation in Chicago is typical of some metropolitan the nation's hospitals than in its immediate effect on admissions. Many experts believe Medicare will stimulate a succession of improvements that will benefit patients of all ages.

The Medicare law enacted last year demands a strict accounting of hospital charges on the basis of cost. For two-thirds of the nation's hospitals, this is new. They have never used cost-accounting procedures, common to well-managed businesses. They have averaged daily costs and applied them to all patients equally. If this continued, Medicare would be paying part of the cost, for example, of maternity, pediatric and other expensive services the aged do not use.

Hospitals want Medicare business. It and Title XIX of the law, which covers welfare patients of all ages, will pay billion of dollars in bills promptly. So averaging will lose out to cost analysis.

All Patients Affected

The change will probably apply to all patients. Separate systems for Medicare patients and others would be too complicated and expensive. Patients will get bills itemized to reflect actual cost to the hospital of the services provided. Charges for X-rays, for example, traditionally padded to cover other costs, will go down. Intensive care charges will go up. Patients will pay for what they get. Money-losing inefficiencies will be spotlighted for hospitals.

"Modern accounting procedures hold great hope for improvement in hospital operations," said Mr. Hague of the journal hospitals.

Medicare regulations also require a close review of patient cases by physician "utilization" committees. This is to make sure that welfare and Medicare patients are not being charged for faulty judgments by doctors, including decisions to extend hospital stays unnecessarily.

This "reviewing" will be as new to many hospitals as pinning down costs.

"We have not had enough pressure to utilize beds or personnel fully," conceded Pat N. Groner, administrator of Baptist Hospital in Pensecola Fla., at a recent Medicare symposium in the American Hospital Association's headquarters.

"Professional review of utilization should be a regular part of every hospital's activity," Mr. Hague said today. "The primary benefit is better care of patients. A simultaneous gain is more efficient use of facilities. The reviews will provide data never before available in any significant portion of our hospitals."

Nursing Homes Cited

There seems to be unanimous agreement that Medicare's efficiency regulations and its payment of nursing home benefits will mean development of new and better facilities for care of patients recuperating from hospital treatment.

"We will see a great deal of construction of nursing homes," Mr. McNerney of Blue Cross declared. "Private capital will find them a high-return investment."

To get Medicare payments, a nursing home must have a full-time registered nurse and practical nurses from state-approved schools. Only 250,000 of the nation's 700,000 nursing-home beds are in homes that meet these standards now.

The upgrading is expected to lessen a patient's resistance to leaving expensive hospital beds. A recent survey in Rochester found that 23 per cent of the patients in the city's hospitals did not need care in hospital beds.

Medicare is also expected to speed a trend to hospital sponsorship of nursing homes, home care by nurses and hospital wings with low-cost beds for convalescents.

"Medicare will accentuate this need," said Leo J. Elsasser, assistant to the executive vice president of Evanston Hospital in the Chicago suburb of Evanston. "A hospital can operate a very good extended-care facility because it has a lot of know-how and all the facilities to back one up. With the major shortage of such facilities, hospitals can find themselves in a bind if they have no place to send patients who still need attention."

Other Spurs Seen

Hospital administrators also believe Medicare coverage of psychiatric and rehabilitation benefits will spur development of needed mental health and rehabilitation facilities.

"The potential use of rehabilitation services with respect to persons 65 and over is just tremendous," Robert M. Signond, executive director of the Hospital Planning Association in Allegheny County, Pa., said at the symposium. "All of the benefits that apply to general hospital care apply to rehabilitation services. I think the general and long-term impact of this legislation will be a great growth in rehabilitation services, but in particular it will be a boost to the free-standing rehabilitation center."

Medicare will pay hospital bills of about $1.5-billion a year. With Title XIX, it will lift a burden of charity care and bad debts from hospitals. Dr. Crosby of the American Hospital Association hopes the result will be much-needed renovation and modernization of hospitals and equipment.

"Medicare will be a great boon to hospitals financially," he declared.

ance with Title VI among the nation's hospitals has improved markedly over the last few weeks. One report that Mr. Gardner gave the President showed 92.2 per cent of general hospital beds across the country had been certified to receive Medicare patients. Nearly all the hospitals that had not complied were in the South.

The worst single instance of discrimination, Mr. Gardner told the President, is Mobile, Ala., where only 30 out of 3,986 beds less than one per cent—will be available to Medicare patients.

In addition, Mr. Gardner listed Shreveport, La., and Jackson and Meridian, Miss., as problem cities. In Shreveport, 341 beds out of 1,939 are available; in Jackson, 346 out of 1,233, and in Meridian, 145 out of 1,784.

The secretary reminded newsmen, however, that these figures could change for the better in the next few days. He also said that in problem areas such as Mobile, Federal officials were trying to persuade hospital administrators to drop discriminatory practices and otherwise comply with the terms of the program.

Douglass Cater Jr., a special assistant to the President, told newsmen that the President and his advisers had also discussed the move by some members of the American Medical Association to persuade their colleagues to send their bills directly to individual patients rather than to the program's billing agents, such as insurance companies and Blue Cross.

The President, Mr. Cater said, took the postion that individual doctors should decide how to handle billings. But Mr. Cater added:

"The President feels sure that doctors will not drive a hard bargain with needy patients by demanding direct, immediate reimbursement."

The Republican statement assailing the Administration was issued while the White House conference was in progress. It called attention to what it said was a shortage of medical facilities across the country, suggested that the advent of Medicare would place new strains on these facilities, and accused the Administration of engaging in a "frantic, eleventh hour scramble to meet a crisis that it should have anticipated long ago."

Gardner Is Quoted

The statement made the following specific points:

¶Little more than 20 per cent of the nursing homes in the country are equipped to provide the nursing care services promised by Medicare.

¶The nation is short "thousands and thousands of nurses and other health personnel, as admitted by Secretary Gardner in his May 23 report to the President."

¶Several programs already enacted by Congress should be immediately implemented "to provide such personnel, services, and facilities that may be necessary to care adequately for the Health of our elderly citizens." Among the programs cited were the Health Professions Educational Assistance Act of 1965 and the Nurse Training Act of 1964.

The Republican Coordinating Committee is composed of the party's former Presidential nominees, members of the Republican leadership of the House and Senate, representatives of the Republican Governors Association, a representative of the Republican State Legislators' Association and representatives of the Republican National Committee.

Following the White House conference, Mr. Gardner acknowledged that the Administration had itemized 88 "problem areas" where overloads might occur.

However, he expressed confidence that any problems that arose could be met by cooperation between local hospital authorities and by Federal help.

sary." However, on the whole, his address was conciliatory, and at one point he declared that it was "wasteful of our collective professional energy to belabor the past."

Dr. Hudson, a 62-year-old internist at the Cleveland Clinic and a professor at Western Reserve University, set a course of "scientific objectivity" for the 214,000-member organization as a means of preventing extension of Medicare into a "national health service."

Although he discounted "drastic" changes for doctors under Medicare, he did, however, forecast new problems, among them a "reservoir of demand beyond our expectations" because of a supplementary Federal-state program for the needy already in effect.

Doctors, Dr. Hudson continued, must become "receptive to new ideas and become the leaders in experimentation in the mechanisms of medical practice."

Although the introduction of Medicare will be "uneven" and "probably vexatious at first and possibly even unfair," this will not necessarily be true everywhere, he said.

Dr. Hudson, as president-elect, worked closely with the outgoing president, Dr. James Z. Appel, to cooperate with the Department of Health, Education and Welfare in the writing of Medicare regulations. Today Dr. Hudson proposed to continue consultation and cooperation with the Government, but not as "extensions of the Government itself."

He acknowledged that there were fears among doctors about new clerical chores and restrictions on their freedom, but he said that the "real threat" ahead was the longer range one of pressures for more and more coverage of more and more people under Medicare and under the Federal-state supplementary program.

To counteract this, he suggested a program that, as he put it, would use concrete proposals instead of "philosophy." This embraces a demonstration of the competency of private doctors to perform necessary technical, professional and administrative services. It also includes a program to meet increased demands with more doctors and facilities, a break with the traditional A.M.A. reluctance to concede there is a doctor shortage, and a statement that is in line with other official actions at this convention.

Dr. Hudson also urged coordinated planning in the profession.

Dr. Hudson, in his inaugural speech this afternoon to the House of Delegates, avoided reference to the controversy over Medicare direct billing. At a news conference this morning, however, he advocated direct billing.

He said doctors would feel more comfortable under it, and conceded that direct billing was a way "to exhibit disapproval of the whole Medicare law."

Dr. Hudson's news conference remarks preceded a statement attributed to President Johnson in Washington that doctors should decide how to handle billings and that the President felt "sure" doctors "will not drive a hard bargain with needy patients by demanding direct, immediate reimbursement."

In response to a question about fears within the Department of Health, Education and Welfare that there would be sharp public reaction to an expected A.M.A. recommendation tomorrow calling for direct billing, Dr. Hudson said department officials were "prematurely anxious."

He conceded that there was little difference mechanically between the use of Medicare machinery for billing and the traditional Blue Shield plan of billing procedures. He noted, however, that under Medicare doctors would be subject to a "reasonable charge" limitation.

To the suggestion that direct billing would stimulate opposition to doctors, Dr. Hudson declared:

"The only way to bring the house down on us is to demonstrate a discrepancy between actual charges and reasonable charges."

Dr. Hudson said patients would be satisfied if the two fees were the same, indicating he thought that they usually would be.

"Average hospital occupancy is 75 per cent," he pointed out. "Optimum is 85 per cent. With Medicare, it will be 80, without any further ups and downs in the near future."

Walter J. McNerney, president of the Blue Cross Association, said only a few areas faced serious bed-shortage problems.

"In those places," he said, "there will be some queueing of persons who have put off elective surgery."

James E. Hague, editor of Hospitals, the journal of the American Hospital Association, said only 10 per cent of the nation's hospitals with 5 per cent of its beds would face demands too great to handle. All are operating at or near capacity now.

He said these included some prestigious hospitals in metropolitan areas and some small hospitals in rural areas. He said a survey showed that 88 counties, many of them in the Southeast, had full hospitals in the latter category.

Chicago Called Typical

The situation in Chicago is typical of some metropolitan areas. Hospitals here are operating at 90 per cent of capacity.

Howard F. Cook, executive director of the Chicago Hospital Council, said they could continue to take all urgent cases immediately. Others will continue to be taken in turn, he said. In Chicago this often means a short wait.

Mr. Cook said he expected no large increase in the waiting list. The tip-off, he continued is that hospital occupancy here has remained constant at 90 per cent. If large numbers of people were putting off surgery until after July 1, he said, occupancy would be down now.

"There has been no decline," he declared. "We have been watching it closely."

Mr. Cook said that 80 per cent of the elderly had health insurance or welfare aid before Medicare, so would not be waiting for surgery out of a need to save money.

Rush Is Discounted

Dr. Edward Henderson, executive director of the American Geriatrics Society, has been one of the forecasters of "an overwhelming rush" on hospitals. He estimated the increase in demand at 50 per cent "or more."

"We find no basis at all for such predictions," said Arthur E. Hess, the man most directly responsible for making Medicare work. "Such figures are pulled right out of the sky."

Mr. Hess is director of the new Bureau of Health Insurance of the Social Security Administration. He said the Government's "outside estimate" was for an increase in elderly patients of 20 per cent.

He noted that the elderly now take a fourth of the country's hospital beds and a 20 per cent increase would push total occupancy up only 5 per cent.

"There are no indications to point to any startling increase," he declared.

Ray E. Brown, director of the graduate program in hospital administration at Duke University, agrees. In the current issue of Trustee, a journal for hospital trustees, he notes that the elderly represent only 9 per cent of the nation's population.

As a practical matter, he goes on, there would probably be no overcrowding no matter how many sought to go to the hospital at one time because under Medicare each patient's physician must attest to need for treatment. Then the doctor would have to schedule the surgery with a hospital that had the bed space and staff to handle the case.

"Surgery the patient could postpone before," said Mr. Cook, "is not so urgent that the physician cannot postpone it further, if necessary."

The problem will be aggravated in areas that have severe shortages of nursing homes and other extended-care facilities, because patients well enough to recuperate out of a hospital but not well enough to go home have no place to go. The Government has offset this to some extent by scheduling Medicare to begin in midsummer, when hospitals are least full because many patients wait to go to hospitals after their summer vacations.

Hospital spokesmen expect far greater impact from Medicare on long-range development of quire a close review of patient cases by physician "utilization" committees. This is to make sure that welfare and Medicare patients are not being charged for faulty judgments leaving expensive hospital beds. A recent survey in Rochester found that 23 per cent of the patients in the city's hospitals did not need care in hospital beds.

result will be much-needed renovation and modernization of hospitals and equipment.

"Medicare will be a great boon to hospitals financially," he declared.

Resolution Urging Doctors to Deal With Patients Approved at Parley

6/30/66

By AUSTIN C. WEHRWEIN

Special to The New York Times

CHICAGO, June 29 — The House of Delegates of the American Medical Association adopted today a resolution that recommended direct billing of patients by each member under Medicare.

Under direct billing doctors would be enabled to ignore the machinery of Medicare, which goes into efect Friday. But in its zeal to encourage use of the method, the 238-member policy-making house went beyond the wishes of its leadership.

The leadership also favors direct billing, but in a carefully worded form. By adopting the resolution, the delegates emphasized they favored "individual responsibility" on the part of patients and their conviction that they were protecting the doctor-patient relationship.

Picked by Acclamation

The development was seen as indicative of the dominant conservative sentiment in the House of delegates, most of whose members are unreconciled to the whole Medicare law and intend to employ direct billing as one means of demonstrating this to patients, the public, Congress and the Johnson Administration.

By acclamation, the delegates selected Dr. Milford O. Rouse, speaker of the House of Delegates, as president-elect, to take office next year. Dr. Rouse, who is from Dallas, is rated as a conservative.

He will follow two president who have set the organization on a moderate course in its relations with the Federal Government—the outgoing president, Dr. James Z. Appel, and the new president, Dr. Charles L. Hudson, who took office yesterday.

Dr. Rouse has wide popularity as a skilled parliamentarian, and this, rather than any ideological factor, is said to have explained his selection in an organization than can often divide on many geographical and professional issues other than political philosophy. He was without opposition for the office.

A.M.A. URGES ALL TO BILL DIRECTLY

While the House also adopted a leadership-sponsored position urging voluntary direct billing "under ordinary circumstances," it was thus left with formal approval of a position that a committee had earlier branded as one that set a "required method" inconsistent with A.M.A. principles of free choice by doctors.

Back of the leadership concern was an apparent fear of falling afoul of the antitrust laws. After the noon recess, Dr. John S. Donaldson Jr. of Pittsburgh, in the home state of Dr. Appel, moved first for reconsideration and when that failed, obtained an amendment stating that the hard-line position should not be interpreted as contrary to an October, 1965, A.M.A. position endorsing free choice.

Dr. Rouse said he wanted to emphasize that the resolutions were meant to be "purely voluntary and not compulsory."

A Trade Association

The A.M.A. is legally a trade association in the eyes of the law and it would run the danger of antitrust prosecution, according to lawyers, if it took a mandatory position directing doctors to take one course or another.

Earlier the House rejected a committee recommendation on a Medicare-related issue. This also aroused private fears among the leadership that it could set up a situation in which an illegal boycott could be charged.

The delegates passed this resolution, although a committee had recommended that it be referred to the trustees for study of its legality. Delegates contended that the time before Medicare goes into effect was too short for legalisms.

Dr. Carroll Witten of Louisville, Ky., said, "I hope we can forget the 'bit' whether it is legal or not."

This resolution from Oregon would make it "unethical" for an A.M.A. member to work in a hospital that dismissed a doctor, such as a radiologist, who insisted on direct billing. Passage of this Oregon resolution brought the moderate new president, Dr. Hudson, to the microphone for an appeal that the action ve reconsidered tomorrow.

Dr. Hudson said "ethics" was a rather "sacred" matter to him that involved "harm to a patient."

Race Move Rejected

The delegates also rejected a move to put teeth into the parent A. M. A. organization's position against racial discrimination at the state and local level. At the same time the delegates took a careful step forward in the civil rights field by agreeing to a study for an appeal procedure by those who allege they are discriminated against.

Also, the A. M. A. moved into the vast area of Federal-state supplementary Medicare law, the law that covers the needy. This is the "Title 19" program that has created dissension in New York. The delegates adopted resolutions urging direct billing under this program in every state.

Under Title 19, the Federal Government provides matching money to states for free medical care for the needy under welfare programs. The states make the basic rules and often under such welfare programs doctors get set fees from the state.

New state legislation would be needed generally to permit direct billing, it was understood here. Direct billing in any event would create major changes in every state welfare system, it is believed. The Federal law is silent on direct billing under Title 19.

Under Medicare as such, which covers persons 65 years of age or older under Social Security, the alternative to direct billing provided in the law is for the doctor to accept an assignment under which the outside limits of his fees are set by a "reasonable charge."

But that reasonable charge is set up by a middle body, typically Blue Shield, rather than by direct governmental action.

The delegates also adopted a resolution asking for a continuing A.M.A. advisory committee for the Federal Committee under Title 19, similar to that set up under Medicare.

New Power in A.M.A.

Milford Owen Rouse

Special to The New York Times

CHICAGO, June 29—Dr. Milford Owen Rouse, the speaker of the American Medical Association House of Delegates who has been chosen president-elect, is a 63-year-old Dallas gastroenterologist.

Physically on the slight side (he stands 5 feet 8 inches, and is slim), Dr. Rouse is soft-spoken, unruffled and elaborately courteous in the old Southern tradition. These qualities served him well during his three years as speaker, a task he performed with evident satisfaction. But his mildness was never taken as softness by the 238 members of the House of Delegates.

Man in the News

Dr. Rouse's quiet manner is deceptive. In fact, he is a doer and a joiner on a large scale, and many honors have come his way. The prize in his hands now is the top position in organized medicine, which is usually reserved by the medical power structure for those who first labor in the lower substructures and go along with the system.

Associated Press

A doer and a joiner

Was Vice Speaker

He has served on many A.M.A. committees, including international health, adviser to the Department of Health, Education and Welfare and joint commission on medicine and pharmacy. He is past president of the Texas Medical Association and the Southern Medical Association and served as vice speaker from 1959 to 1963.

Dr. Rouse is considered more conservative than the outgoing president, Dr. James Z. Appel of Pennsylvania and the incoming president, Dr. Charles L. Hudson of Cleveland. The president-elect waits in the wings for a year before becoming president.

Dr. Rouse has characterized himself as an "independent conservative," although he once filled in a biographical form for The Dallas News with the notation, "formerly Democrat — ashamed of it." More recently, Dr. Rouse has put it: "I'm a Democrat whose party has left him."

His chairmanship of the A.M.A. Committee on Medicine and Religion since 1962 has afforded him even more satisfaction than the speaker's gavel. Dr. Rouse said that the doctor-minister relationship was important and that whereas it was "a disjointed thing, now clergymen are recognized members of the health team."

This, he believes, brings the patient closer to "complete care."

Dr. Rouse belongs to the ultra-right-wing Association of American Physicians and Surgeons, made up of A.M.A. members but without any link to the A.M.A. It is a political-economic rather than a medical group, and some of its leaders are members of the John Birch Society.

Dr. Rouse is a former director of the Life-Line Foundation, an ultra-right organization supported by H. L. Hunt, the Texas oil millionaire.

As speaker, Dr. Rouse was neutral during debate, but he made no secret of his bitter opposition to Medicare. In this context, he has said:

"We should be citizens first and then physicians. We ought to regard ourselves as consultants in health to the whole community."

Dr. Rouse was born in Jacksonville, Tex., on Aug. 10, 1902, of Southern Baptist missionary parents and early in life spent a year with them in Brazil and another in Cuba. He dates his desire to become a doctor to his childhood, when a Brazilian physician pulled him through meningtis.

He received A.B., M.A. and M.D. degrees from Baylor University and in 1927 married a fellow student, Miss Leaureame McDavid. He then joined the Army Medical Service at Fort Sam Houston.

After finishing Army duty, Dr. Rouse went to Dallas and joined the late Dr. H. G. Walcott. He is now the senior member in a team of five doctors with headquarters in the Medical Arts Building.

Helped Found Museum

Dr. Rouse helped found the Dallas Health and Science Museum in 1946 on the grounds of the state fair of Texas. He is a life member of the Optimist Club, a 32d-degree Scottish Rite Mason and a Shriner. He was a founding director of the Dallas Council on Aging, the Dallas Citizens Traffic Commission, the Community Planning Council and the Texas chapter of the American Cancer Society. He is an avid amateur photographer, and has a library of more than 3,000 volumes.

The Texas Medical Association in 1964 gave him its distinguished service award for "meritorious achievement in medical science, public service and service to the medical profession." That same year, the Texas Hospital Association conferred honorary membership on him "for serving the citizens of Texas both publicly and privately."

Dr. and Mrs. Rouse have one daughter, Mrs. C. L. Sawyer of Dallas, and three grandchildren.

Mr. John W. Gardner, Secretary
U. S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare
Washington, D. C.

Dear Mr. Gardner:

At least twice within the past two or three weeks I have noticed reports in local newspapers that southern school officials and some politicans are advocating dismissal of Mr. Stanley Kruger, director of the Equal Education Opportunity Program for Georgia, Florida and South Carolina.

For whatever it may be worth -- and without solicitation from anyone -- I would like to say that it has been my privilege to participate in several conferences at which Mr. Kruger spoke and answered questions (some hostile questions), that I have had a few conversations with him, and that I have observed him to be notably and unfailingly calm, objective, and fair. He has at the same time explained quite clearly the intent and requirements of the law concerning school desegregation. Many of us who are professionally concerned with civil rights and human relations problems in the South have appreciated very much his understanding of the problem of dealing with southern officials.

I, for one, think that he has done an excellent job and that no one could do what is necessary at all without incurring the antipathy of those who are now calling for his dismissal. I sincerely hope that the outcry against Mr. Kruger will be ignored.

Yours truly,

J. Edwin Stanfield

Nursing Homes Get Guides; Told to Desegregate by Jan. 1

AC 8/31/66

By REMER TYSON
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — Nursing homes providing skilled care must demonstrate to the federal government by Jan. 1 that they do not practice racial discrimination or lose all U.S. funds, the Public Health Service announced Tuesday.

These were the latest set of desegregation guidelines aimed primarily at Southern institutions to be issued by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare under the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

Robert M. Nash, chief of the PHS's Office of Equal Health Opportunity, said in announcing the guidelines:

"Nursing homes which practice discrimination face termination of all federal funds they may be receiving now and will not be able to receive any federal funds in the future.

"The Office of Equal Health Opportunity will make the determinations of compliance with the assistance of other units in the Department of Health, Education and Welfare."

Part of a PHS release stated, "Nursing homes that wish to take part in Medicare or welfare programs must demonstrate that they provide services to all people without regard to race, color or national origin."

Substantial funds also are available from the federal government for construction of nursing homes.

In addition to meeting the non-discrimination provision of Title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, nursing homes will be required to meet by next Jan. 1 the quality-of-care standards set by the Social Security Administration in order to participate in the Medicare program.

The PHS had put off announcement of the guidelines for nursing homes because of massive work involved in hospital desegregation this summer.

The guidelines will be sent to nursing homes through state agencies this week along with detailed instructions on how to complete compliance report forms.

4,000 Hospitals Face Integration

HOSPITALS

AC-3/9/66

By JOHN HERBERS

(Copyright 1966 by the New York Times News Co.)

WASHINGTON—The Public Health Service is planning to use funds designated for health care for the aged to bring some 7,000 hospitals into compliance with the federal law against racial discrimination.

These are hospitals which have not been required to comply with Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 because they have not been receiving direct assistance from the federal government.

Surgeon General William H. Stewart said virtually all hospitals in the nation will benefit from the health insurance program for the aged which goes into effect July 1. Most hospitals, he said, will receive more than 20 per cent of their income from the program.

In some 4,000 hospitals which have been receiving direct aid, the insurance program for the aged money will be used as an additional means of securing compliance with Title VI, which prohibits discrimination because of race or national origin in any federally assisted program.

The service has mailed letters to all hospitals detailing what will be expected if they expect to receive the aged care money or other federal assistance. In order to enforce its regulations, the service has set up a special office with a staff of 100, most of whom will be stationed in regional offices to investigate complaints.

Although there has been widespread voluntary compliance with Title VI in hospitals and other health facilities, civil rights groups have charged that many hospitals, most in the South, have persisted in discrimination while continuing to receive federal assistance.

The chief problem, official sources said, is that the service has not been able to investigate adequately the instances of noncompliance.

Under the new setup, there will be more investigations. In addition, all hospitals will be asked to designate on a questionnaire their handling of patients and staff by race. If discrimination is found, hospitals will be given an opportunity to correct it.

"Where the discrimination persists," Stewart said, "the hospital will be excluded from any new federal assistance programs. . . . When negotiations fail to achieve compliance, steps will be taken under Title VI to terminate present assistance, or compliance will be secured through enforcement by the courts."

The guidelines for compliance include assigning patients to wards and rooms on a non-racial basis and patients are not to be asked if they are willing to share a room with a person of another race. Doctors and nurses are to be assigned to patients without regard to race.

"Courtesy titles (Mr., Mrs., Dr., etc.), whenever used, are to be used throughout the hospital, including patient care areas, and in news releases announcing admissions, births, deaths, etc.," the guidelines say.

Hospitals Warned U.S. Aid Will Hinge on Compliance

3/9/66

By JOHN HERBERS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 8—The United States Public Health Service is planning to use Medicare funds to bring about 7,000 hospitals into compliance with the Federal law against racial discrimination.

These are hospitals that have not been required to comply with Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 because they have not been receiving direct assistance from the Federal Government.

Surgeon General William H. Stewart said virtually all hospitals in the nation would benefit from Medicare, the health insurance program for the aged that goes into effect July 1. Most hospitals, he said, will receive more than 20 per cent of their income from Medicare.

In about 4,000 hospitals that have been receiving direct aid, Medicare money will be used as an additional means of assuring compliance with Title VI, which prohibits discrimination because of race or national origin in any federally assisted program.

Officials believe that Medicare and other Federal assistance will make up so large a portion of hospital budgets that virtually all will comply with the Civil Rights Act in order to continue receiving it.

Hospitals Are Warned

The Public Health Service has mailed letters to all hospitals detailing what will be expected under Title VI if they expect to receive Medicare or other Federal assistance. In order to enforce its regulations, the service has set up a special Office of Equal Health Opportunity, which will have a staff of 100 persons, most of whom will be stationed in regional offices to investigate complaints.

Although there has been widespread voluntary compliance with Title VI in hospitals and other health facilities, civil rights groups have charged that many hospitals, mostly in the South, have persisted in discrimination while continuing to receive Federal assistance.

The chief problem, official sources said, is that the Public Health Service has not been able to investigate adequately the instances of noncompliance.

Under the new setup, there will be more investigations. In addition, all hospitals will be asked to designate on a questionnaire their handling of patients and staff by race. If discrimination is found, hospitals will be given an opportunity to correct it.

"Where the discrimination persists," Dr. Stewart said, "the hospital will be excluded from any new Federal assistance programs. When negotiations fail to achieve compliance, steps will be taken under Title VI to terminate present assistance, or compliance will be secured through enforcement by the courts."

The guidelines for compliance include the assigning of patients to wards and rooms on a nonracial basis. In addition, patients are not to be asked if they are willing to share a room with a person of another race, and doctors and nurses are to be assigned to patients without regard to race.

"Courtesy titles (Mr. Mrs. Dr., etc.), whenever used, are to be used throughout the hospital, including patient-care areas, an including patient-care areas, and missions, births, deaths, etc.," the guidelines say.

The guidelines also say that dining or other facilities are not to be used only by nonwhites through "custom" or "preference," and that hospitals that have dual facilities must "convert one of them to a different purpose or take steps to change the traffic flow so that they are actually used biracially."

Nursing homes and other health facilities receiving Federal assistance will also be subject to the new regulations. Letters will go out to them later.

U.S. Is Centering Probe In South on Negro Protests

By GENE ROBERTS

(Copyright 1966 by the New York Times Co.)

The Department of Health, Education and Welfare plans to begin a massive inspection program Monday to bring the nation's hospitals into compliance with the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

A spokesman for the department said in Atlanta it will use "approximately 100" Social Security Administration and Public Health Service employes, all of them trained in special classes which ended here last week, to make the on-the-scene studies of the hospitals.

If any hospital is not taking immediate steps to end racial discrimination, he said, it will not be eligible for federal funds, beginning July 1. On that date, the department plans to begin releasing $1.9 billion in funds for hospital construction, medical training programs and vocational rehabilitation.

"The inspectors will determine whether or not a hospital is in compliance with the act," the spokesman said, "and if it is not, the inspectors will be available to advise and assist them."

Title VI of the Civil Rights Act says that "no person in the United States shall, on the grounds of race, color or national origin, be excluded from participating in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any program receiving financial assistance."

Thus far, 60 per cent of the nation's hospitals have filed compliance forms with the department, indicating that they are willing to abide by the act. About half this number stated on the forms that they are already in "full compliance."

The department has been doing some inspection almost continually since the passage of the act, a spokesman said, and has stepped up the program in recent weeks. But Monday will mark the beginning of the first massive inspection, he added.

Although the inspections will be carried on throughout the nation, a major portion of the inspectors will be concentrated in the South where hospitals traditionally have been segregated.

In recent months, southern Negroes have become increasingly critical of the failure of some of the region's hospitals to drop racial barriers. In Natchez, one of the South's major racial battlegrounds late last year, hospital desegregation was one of the key demands made on the city by civil rights demonstrators.

Hospitals Told to Desegregate By July 1 or Face U.S. Lawsuit

Wash. Post 4/13/66

ATLANTA, April 12 (AP) Hospitals are going to be required to comply with the civil rights act by July 1, and are not going to be permitted a gradual transition such as that in the schools, a Federal spokesman said today.

Federal workers are meeting with hospital administrators in six Southern states. The hospitals must comply by July 1 to meet medicare standards. However, other Federal requirements must be taken into account, too, the spokesman said.

Although some hospitals said last year they would not comply, William J. Page Jr., regional director of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, said they have no choice and must comply.

Page said that when a hospital does not comply to Title 6 (referring to grants and aid), the Justice Department can bring suit under Title 3, which is the public accommodations section.

Although some administrators have said the desegregation should be done gradually, Page said this wasn't going to happen.

"There is going to be no gradual transition in desegregation of hospitals, like that in the school systems," he said. "It will have to be done now."

Maine Tavern Refuses Service to Mixed Couple

PORTLAND, Maine, April 12 (AP)—A waitress in a Portland beer parlor was charged today with violating Maine's anti-discrimination public accomodations law by refusing to serve a white woman who was accompanied by a Negro man.

The complaint was signed by Mrs. Ann Jordan of Portland, local secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, who went into the restaurant with another NAACP official.

Gerald E. Talbot, president to the local NAACP chapter said his organization had received at least five complaints that Donahue's Restaurant wouldn't serve mixed couples, and decided to test the restaurant.

Negroes End Boycott In Mississippi Town

FAYETTE, Miss., April 12 (AP)—A five-month boycott by Negroes of white merchants here has quietly eased off with this southwest Mississippi town making a number of concessions, a spokesman said today.

Attorney Jimmy Walker, spokesman for the merchants, said henceforth Negroes will be called by courtesy titles—Mr., Mrs. or Miss. He said the town has hired a Negro policeman and the county has employed a parttime Negro deputy sheriff.

White and Negro leaders quietly reached an agreement following a series of talks on Negro grievances, Walker said.

Rights Commission Plans Philadelphia Probe

United Press International

The U.S. Civil Rights Commission said yesterday it has sent a fact finding team to Philadelphia to learn how the city is handling its school desegregation problems, a practice it plans to follow in a number of cities across the nation.

"We're not going into a city to be critical of its schools or school management," the spokesman said. "In the case of Philadelphia, we want to see what the schools are doing in the way of desegregation—the progress it has made, programs under way and the problems incurred along the way."

End of U.S. School Aid Asked in Mississippi City

Associated Press

A hearing examiner has ruled that Federal aid to the Greenwood, Miss., municipal separate school district should be ended because of failure to comply with the 1964 Civil Rights Act, it was learned yesterday.

This is the 42d initial decision dealing with school districts in Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana and Mississippi in which hearing examiners have ruled that Federal aid should be terminated.

5 Mississippi Counties Face U.S. Vote Probes

Attorney General Nicholas deB. Katzenbach ordered Federal examiners into five more Mississippi counties yesterday to register Negroes under the 1965 Voting Rights Act.

The action brings to 42 the number of counties designated for examiners under the act—24 in Mississippi, 11 in Alabama, 5 in Louisiana and 2 in South Carolina.

Katzenbach said examiners will be sent next week to Claiborne, Jasper, Noxubee, Rankin and Winston counties.

3 Area Hospitals Facing Charges Of Discrimination

4/14/66 WP

Complaints to the Federal Government alleging racial discrimination have been filed against at least ten hospitals in Virginia and two in Maryland, officials confirmed yesterday.

Among them are Arlington Hospital, Alexandria Hospital and Leland Memorial in Riverdale.

Complaints against these facilities are among 364 filed across the Nation as of April 1, according to a Department of Health, Education and Welfare list.

Officials emphasized these are individuals' complaints rather than government charges. A team of more than 100 Federal agents has been organized to check out the allegations, with the ultimate possibility of Medicare and other Federal funds being cut off from hospitals found to discriminate in patient treatment.

Spokesmen for Alexandria and Leland hospitals denied any discrimination, and Arlington administrators were unavailable for comment late yesterday.

Frank Whalen, Alexandria assistant administrator, said his hospital had been "thoroughly checked out" and "to the best of our knowledge given a clean bill of health." It is "probably a question of a time lag," he said.

Lloyd P. Lind, Leland Hospital administrator, said there has "never been any discrimination regarding employes or patients and never will be" at Leland.

Names of the Virginia hospitals against which complaints were filed were initially released by the Virginia Council on Human Relations, which urged speedy and full compliance with the 1964 Civil Rights Act mandate for equal treatment and offered assistance in arranging compliance procedures.

Other Virginia hospitals cited included:

Chesapeake and Ohio Hospital and Nursing School in Clifton Forge, Loudoun County Memorial Hospital in Leesburg, Lynchburg General Hospital and Nursing School, Mary View Hospital in Portsmouth, Petersburg General Hospital, Portsmouth General Hospital, South Hill Public Hospital and Southampton Memorial Hospital in Franklin.

Complaints reportedly have been led against two other Virginia hospitals but they were not officially listed.

In addition to Leland Calvert County Hospital in Maryland was listed.

The Federal probe has brought a protest from the executive secretary of the Virginia Hospital Association, Stuart Ogren, who said some hospitals will "forget Medicare and other welfare programs" rather than bow to Federal demands.

WALLACE ORDERS NEW SEGREGATION

Rescinds the Integration of Alabama Mental Hospitals

4/28/66

By GENE ROBERTS

Special to The New York Times

MONTGOMERY, Ala., April 27 — Segregation returned to Alabama's mental hospitals today at the order of Gov. George C. Wallace.

The action came just one week after the hospitals were desegregated and just six days before a Democratic gubernatori primary in which Governor Wallace's wife is seeking to succeed him.

The State Hospital Board h desegregated the hospitals, a spokesman said, in order t comply with the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and to maintain the state's eligibility for Federal hospital aid.

This morning, however, 30 white patients were removed from predominantly Negro wards at Search Hospital in Mount Vernon and returned to Bryce Hospital at Tuscaloosa 140 miles away.

At the same time 30 Negro patients were returned to Searcy from predominantly white wards at Bryce.

The shuffle left Searcy Hospital with 2,500 Negro patients, and no white patients and left Bryce with 4,800 white patients and 400 Negroes in segregated buildings.

'Retransfer' in Morning

Dr. J. S. Tarwater, director of the State Department of Mental Health, confirmed that the "retransfer" had taken plac this morning less than 24 hours after he had "received a communication" from the Governor's office in which Mr. Wallace expressed opposition to the desegregation program.

Although the State Hospitals Board had voted on Dec. 16 to desegregate the hospitals and announced its decision publicly on March 14, yesterday's communication was the first time that Governor Wallace made his views known to hospital authorities, Dr. Tarwater said.

"After today," Dr. Tarwater added, "I would imagine that we would no longer be eligible for Federal aid."

The timing of Governor Wallace' action caused some of his opponents to complain privately that the move was taken to increase segregationist support for his wife's campaign.

Opponents Silent

But as of late today none of the other nine candidates in the race had attacked the Governor for the move.

Governor Wallace has become nationally known as a militant segregationist, but in the current campaign he has avoided the words "segregation" in speeches for his wife and has been careful to pronounce the word "Negro" correctly.

A spokesman for the Governor said that Mr. Wallace had "demanded that the patients in question be returned to the hospitals from which they had been removed."

"The Governor's action was taken," the spokesman added, "after his office received several complaints from patients' families."

Dr. Tarwater said that there had been complaints from two white families, but that otherwise the week-long experiment and desegregation had gone "smoothly."

MEDICARE FACING CIVIL RIGHTS SNAG

Hospitals in South Fighting Compliance With Title VI

By JOHN HERBERS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 25—A color map in the corner of the room told the story.

Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, South Carolina and Virginia were painted a vivid orange, meaning that fewer than 25 per cent of the hospital beds in those states had been cleared for Medicare patients under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which is intended to ban racial discrimination in any Federally assisted program.

Arkansas, Tennessee, North Carolina and Florida were painted with blue stripes, indicating that less than 50 per cent of the beds in those states had been cleared.

The Department of Health, Education and Welfare faces a crisis in achieving Title VI comcompliance in large areas of the South before July 1, when the Federal program of health care for the aged becomes effective.

The program is expected to put a strain on medical facilities throughout the nation, and unless hospitals are certified for Federal funds many patients, both whites and Negroes, will have to be turned away.

The department is now engaged in a crash program to achieve compliance in the few weeks remaining. As part of that program, top officials of state hospital associations in 20 states were called in today for an emergency conference down the hall from Secretary John W. Gardner's office.

Although the meeting was closed, H. E. Hamilton, president of the Louisiana Hospital Association, told reporters afterward what the greatest problem is.

"It's the requirement that Negroes and whites be permitted to share the same hospital room," he said. "I don't know what the hospitals will do but I hear that some of them don't see how they can comply."

Mr. Hamilton said the hospital at Oxford, La., of which he is administrator, has been fully integrated for a year but 90 per cent of the personnel who work there do not like it.

Dr. Leo J. Gehrig, deputy surgeon general, said he was encouraged by the tone of the meeting and expressed hope that general compliance would be forthcoming before the July 1 deadline. Some informed officials in the department, however, said privately that they were less optimistic.

Title VI has met with less success in hospitals than in almost any other area where the Administration has attempted to apply it. Civil rights groups have filed hundreds of complaints against hospitals receiving Federal funds.

Several months ago, the department decided to use Medicare as a new lever for bringing many of them into compliance. It is expected that Medicare funds will constitute a substantial share of the budgets of most hospitals.

All hospitals were asked to fill in forms indicating the extent of integration. What rankled some hospitals in the South was a section asking how many rooms, wards and floors contained both whites and Negroes. The hospitals were also asked to show the percentage of nonwhite population in the area served.

In hospital circles this became known as "the numbers game" and it was understood that the Government would require a percentage of integration in wards and rooms equivalent to the Negro-white ratio in the community.

Doctors Reassured

F. Peter Libassi, special assistant to Secretary Gardner in charge of civil rights, is now assuring hospital administrators that this is not intended — that white and Negro patients must merely be assigned without regard to race. A doctor may move a patient out of an integrated room if he considers such a move necessary to the health of the patient.

If a check shows, however, that whites and Negroes are never assigned to the same room the hospital obviously will not be considered in compliance, Mr. Libassi said.

The department now has 300 staff members out checking on and attempting to achieve compliance. A White House statement released yesterday said about 1,000 hospitals, most of them in the South had not been brought into compliance with Title VI.

These include most of the hospitals in the large metropolitan areas, such as Atlanta and New Orleans. Officials say these will probably be brought into compliance before the deadline, but they are less optimistic about hospitals in small cities and towns

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

HOSPITALS AND TITLE VI OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964

During the past three months, about 5200 hospitals in the United States have demonstrated that they are in compliance with Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and will be approved for Medicare when it begins July 1. But hundreds of other hospitals, wishing to comply, are bound up in procedural and other difficulties.

To help these hospitals, the American Hospital Association has asked the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare certain questions about compliance procedures and criteria. The department has answered them. These answers have been reviewed by Secretary John W. Gardner and Surgeon General William H. Stewart, and they are printed below. Any administrator who has further questions should call the nearest of the department's regional offices immediately. A member of its field force will respond to the hospitals at once.

1. What does a hospital have to do to be in compliance with Title VI of the Civil Rights Act for purposes of Medicare?

The law says "No person in the United States shall, on the ground of race, color or national origin, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance."

Discrimination in hospitals exists when a patient, visitor, professional staff member, or trainee is treated differently solely because of his race, color, or national origin. Compliance with Title VI, in brief, involves admission policies, patient room assignments, availability of services and facilities, staff privileges, and training programs.

2. How can a hospital accomplish all of this between now and July 1?

Hospitals already have had nearly two years to comply and many have acted to do so. The Civil Rights Act was passed in July 1964, and the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare issued its regulations in January 1965. During the past three months the U.S. Public Health Service has assigned some 300 professionals to the field to work with hospitals and answer their questions.

It is true that not all steps toward compliance can be taken overnight. Student nurse classes, for example, do not begin until September, and it takes time to grant staff privileges to physicians.

But some other things can be done immediately. Physicians previously excluded from staff privileges can be informed that their applications will now be considered without regard to race, color, or national origin. Applications can be invited and discriminatory selection policies can be changed. Recruitment plans can be developed and carried out with equal emphasis on predominantly white and predominantly Negro high schools. Cessation of discriminatory room assignments can be accomplished immediately and the result can be demonstrated to the satisfaction of the federal government in a couple of weeks.

3. Will the government approve a hospital on the evidence of a questionnaire alone?

Subject to an on-site visit later, yes. A written assurance of compliance already has been accepted from about 5200 hospitals on this basis.

4. Will the government disapprove a hospital on the basis of a questionnaire alone?

No. No hospital wishing to comply will be disapproved without a personal visit by a representative of HEW and a full consultation with the hospital administrator.

5. What kind of inspection does the federal government carry on in connection with Title VI?

Representatives of the federal government do not visit a hospital unannounced unless there is gross evidence that a hospital deliberately concealed discrimination during a previous visit. With the administrator and members of his staff, the representatives will tour the hospital and its service areas. They will be interested in observing room assignments, dining areas, waiting rooms, sitting rooms, and other general service facilities. They will also want to see whether outpatient services are used without regard to race, color, or national origin.

From the reports of these representatives, the Public Health Service hopes to assist those hospitals that may be practicing discrimination in some aspects of their operations and to show them what actions must be taken to assure compliance.

6. Why are the government's procedures so complicated?

The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare does not believe they are complicated; quite the reverse. It is perfectly natural that there are and will continue to be difficulties in carrying out the present program. On the other hand, a large number of hospitals have already been approved; they have accomplished this by nothing more than filling out a one-page questionnaire. This one questionnaire meets the needs not only of Medicare and the Social Security Administration, but of at least 50 other government programs, including Hill-Burton, federal manpower training, and the surplus foods program of the Department of Agriculture.

7. If 30 per cent of a hospital's community is Negro, must 30 per cent of its patients be Negro, too?

Title VI for hospitals is not being administered as a numbers game. If there is any misunderstanding about this, it needs correction. The purpose of the department's examination is to determine whether every citizen in the community receives nondiscriminatory treatment. It must be established that this is true, not as an occasional exception to the rule, but as a regular thing. But there is no quota.

8. How can a hospital control the racial balance of its patients?

Again, it is not a "balance" that is required, but the assurance that Negro and white patients are not treated differently—that physicians are not sending their Negro patients to one hospital and white patients to another.

When a hospital grants staff privileges to both Negro and white physicians, when it is free of discrimination in every way, then the ratio of patient population, Negro and white, takes care of itself.

9. Does Title VI require that there be a Negro and a white patient in every room?

It does not. But it does require that all patients be assigned to rooms, wards, floors, or buildings of hospitals without regard to race, color, or national origin.

Hospitals routinely take into consideration such factors as medical condition, room rates, and age in the assignment of rooms. These normal procedures which do not involve racial questions may be continued, just so long as the rules apply to both white and Negro patients.

Patients may not be asked if they would be willing to share a room with a person of a particular race.

10. If a physician believes that his patient should be moved from a nonsegregated room after his admission, can this be done?

In some cases there may be valid medical reasons or special compelling circumstances for the reassignment of patients, and in these cases, reassignment may be made. Patients are, of course, free at any time to request assignment to available private rooms. But transfer of patients may not be used as a device to evade compliance with the Civil Rights Act. Although room for the exercise of good judgment is recognized as necessary, a pattern of resegregation in the use of rooms is a violation.

The ultimate concern is with the end result of the hospital's practices. Do patients, in fact, use accommodations throughout the hospital without regard to race? If there is a pattern of desegregated rooms, wings, and floors, the hospital is in compliance. If this is not the pattern, the hospital is not in compliance.

11. How can a hospital give staff privileges to Negro physicians between now and July 1?

Obviously it may take time to evaluate a physician's qualifications for staff privileges. The Public Health Service's immediate—before July 1—requirements are (1) that Negro physicians be informed that staff privileges are granted at the hospital without regard to race, and that they may apply for those privileges, (2) that any selection factors that directly or indirectly exclude physicians because of race, color, or national origin be abolished, and (3) that all pending applications for staff privileges be considered and acted on promptly without regard to the applicant's race, color, or national origin. The Civil Rights Act does not require that staff privileges be granted to any physician who is not qualified.

12. What happens if a hospital does not comply?

It now appears that the great majority of American hospitals—and hospitals in all sections of the country—will be qualified and ready to receive Medicare patients on July 1. For this, the whole country can be grateful.

If, in the short time left, anything can be done to bring every hospital into compliance with the Civil Rights Act, the department will do everything in its power to help.

If a hospital does not comply with the provisions of Title VI, it will not receive funds under Medicare and will not be able to apply for grants under other federal programs. More importantly, patients who are qualified for Medicare benefits will not have Medicare funds for use in their own hospital.

In the department's opinion, hospitals who are not in compliance with Title VI and who forgo participation in Medicare will, to this degree, be out of the mainstream of medical care in this country. However, the law does not compel a private hospital to qualify.■

HOSPITAL OFFICIALS BATTLE RED TAPE

Medicare Makes Them Cringe

By MARJORY RUTHERFORD

Want to see a hospital administrator wince?

The magic word is "Medicare."

With the advent of Uncle Sam's revolutionary new program of health care for senior citizens less than a month away, most Georgia hospital officials are still bogged down in the paper work and federal red tape of getting "approved."

At last official count, 291,000 Georgians aged 65 and over had signed up for Medicare. (Thousands more undoubtedly got under the May 31 wire last week, but late figures haven't been compiled.)

At last official count, five — count 'em, five — Georgia hospitals had been certified, none of them in the Atlanta area.

The hospital certification figure, at this stage, "doesn't give the picture at all," insists Douglas Richard, of the Social Security Administration's Hospital Insurance Bureau.

Richard and Glenn M. Hogan, executive director of the Georgia Hospital Association, both express "growing confidence" that by July 1 "majority of Georgia hospitals" will be approved for Medicare.

ON WEDNESDAY — exactly one month before the hospital phase of Medicare benefits begins — Georgia State Health Department's Branch of Certification and Licensure had surveyed and-or received utilization information from nearly 150 hospitals across the state.

Raymond J. Hereth, branch Medicare services administrator, on the same day reported 76 Georgia hospitals had received the branch's stamp of approval on standards. In this group were a dozen Atlanta hospitals with a total of 3,513 beds.

Thirty-five Georgia hospitals, Richard said, have cleared another hurdle — eligibility under Title VI, or the civil rights provision.

The rub is getting both kinds of approval, with the papers to prove it. The official forms and notice take time.

That's why, a month before Medicare, only five Georgia hospitals were on the official certified list. They are: Memorial be due to the variety of government units involved.

State Health Department spokesmen blame hospitals for not acting sooner to get necessary papers in. Hospital spokesmen vow they got up required information and then "Washington changed it on us, called for something new, or even lost our papers."

Some fear new changes in regulations may come at the last minute "to ball things up again."

At a meeting here less than two weeks ago — where some Georgia members of the American Association of Hospital Accountants expressed confusion and less than enthusiastic approval of Medicare billing methods — Dr. Madison R. Brown, of Chicago, associate director of the American Hospital Association, hinted at a possible "eleventh hour, 59th minute change" following criticism by Sen. Russell Long, Dem.-La., of planned advance Medicare payments to participating hospitals.

DR. BROWN SAID that he felt most hospitals across the country "will meet the challenge." He also said he did not anticipate the sudden influx of Medicare patients some fear in July.

Norman D. Burkett, administrator of Whitfield County's Hamilton Memorial Hospital in Dalton, the first Georgia hospital certified to provide Medicare health services, commented:

"I may be surprised, but I don't expect any sudden surge of Medicare patients. Certainly there will be an impact, but we feel Medicare will mean only about a 5 per cent increase in patient days."

Last month, Burkett reported, the Dalton hospital had 66 patients aged 65 or older out of a total of 688 patients admitted.

He attributed early certification of Hamilton Memorial to "fine leadership" of his staff.

"As soon as we knew the requirements," he said, "we moved with our utilization plan."

Burkett pulled records to show that his hospital has had 495 patients of Medicare age since October, 1965. Their average stay was nine days — twice that patient's whim or prejudice" would not.

A check of Atlanta area hospital administrators showed most expect ultimate clearance and are "hopeful for the best" in coping with new demands for beds and service.

Most reminded of Atlanta's long - standing hospital bed shortages and of worsening shortages of nurses, doctors, almost all paramedical workers.

The "help shortage," Richard declared, is "a far worse problem than slow certification of hospitals."

In many metropolitan areas across the nation — more so than in small towns and rural areas — hospital bed shortages already are acute. Here in Atlanta in April the Community Council of the Atlanta Area, Inc., reported that an estimated 2,544 beds will be added in the metropolitan area within the next 10 years. Eventually, for example, DeKalb General hopes to double its capacity.

But that is ahead, and Medicare is almost here. Only last winter physicians here had ill patients, including in several instances victims of heart attacks, "on waiting lists" to get into badly crowded Atlanta hospitals. In New York City most hospitals run 75 to 78 per cent of capacity; in Atlanta for several years the percentage is closer to 90 per cent, especially in "popular" modern hospitals like Piedmont.

ANOTHER NOT - GOOD STRAW in the wind: The Community Council's report noted that future expansion of medical, nursing and paramedical education programs here are less well-defined.

"Unless we can turn more people toward careers in the health field," one observer said, "we're in trouble, with or without Medicare."

Officials less worried about the impact of Medicare point out that already most Georgia hospitals handle Kerr - Mills patients and that, by and large, senior citizens are expected to increase hospital leads only about 5 per cent.

All through June hospital insurance servicemen will be sur-vision and radio spots" recently released.

"Medicare is so tremendous and complex," the announcer is supposed to say soothingly, "there's bound to be some confusion at first. Not all hospitals will receive government approval for Medicare participation by the time it starts July 1, which means those approved might have more applicants than there are available hospital beds.

"Remember . . . Medicare does not guarantee you a hospital bed. It only promises to pay the bills after you are admitted to the hospital. . . . Don't drop your present hospitalization insurance policies until you check first. . . . Keep your present insurance in force as long as necessary."

MEDICARE COVERAGE of nursing homes does not go into effect until Jan. 1, 1967. There are shortages there, too.

The other Medicare phase that begins July 1, the government's footing of doctor bills under a $3-per-month voluntary program of medical insurance for oldsters, has caused less public consternation lately.

Originally physicians across the nation protested Medicare. Most now plan to cooperate, although a lot of Atlanta doctors are privately grim about prospects ahead.

Many already-overworked medical men dread increased demands on their time. But the American Medical Association cooperated with Robert M. Ball, commissioner of Social Security, in preparing a Medicare reference guide for physicians.

And a recent AMA memorandum, prepared by the association's law department, told physicians they can make a distinction between private and federally assisted welfare patients without incurring penalties under the 1964 Civil Rights Act. Doctors can maintain separate offices and office hours for Medicare patients, as long as they do not discriminate among them on racial grounds, the memo states.

To Pinkston and some other administrators, Medicare mainly will mean more funds for care of the aged. But a lot of the others are muttering over bookkeeping problems, aggravated personnel shortages, the prospect of turning away disappointed patients, above all "that cussed red tape."

A hospital business manager's wife put it this way: "I don't mind so much my husband talking about Medicare in his sleep —but, oh, the language he uses!

Raymond J. Hereth, branch Medicare services administrator, on the same day reported 76 Georgia hospitals had received the branch's stamp of approval on standards. In this group were a dozen Atlanta hospitals with a total of 3,513 beds.

Thirty-five Georgia hospitals, Richard said, have cleared another hurdle — eligibility under Title VI, or the civil rights provision.

The rub is getting both kinds of approval, with the papers to prove it. The official forms and notice take time.

That's why, a month before Medicare, only five Georgia hospitals were on the official certified list. They are: Memorial Hospital, Waycross (209 beds); John L. Hutcheson Memorial-Tri-Counties Hospital, Fort Oglethorpe (141 beds); Hamilton Memorial Hospital, Dalton (150 beds); Upson County Hospital, Thomaston (88 beds), and Forsyth County Hospital, Cumming (36 beds).

"DON'T NEEDLESSLY ALARM our elderly citizens," Richard commented. "From our point of view, things are moving on schedule and there will be a big change in the figures by mid-June."

Richard is the man who "countersigns" hospitals approved as to operating standards when he gets the word from HEW that they are also eligible on Title VI — that is, that they will show no racial discrimination.

On his desk Wednesday, he said, were papers for most Atlanta area hospitals showing that administrators have signed Medicare agreements and that they meet operating standards and have satisfied state surveyors with their utilization plans.

Only Title VI survey approval is missing from papers for Crawford Long (415 beds), DeKalb General (230), Emory (341), Georgia Baptist (466), Grady Memorial (1,086), Holy Family (135), Jesse Parker Williams (44), Marietta's Kennestone (383), Piedmont (282), Ponce de Leon Infirmary (32), St. Joseph's Infirmary (153), and South Fulton (153).

"It is only a matter of time" before these hospitals are cleared, Richard believes. Most, he pointed out, are already working with Blue Cross and other hospital insurance representatives on the intricacies of payment plans.

Grady Hospital administrator J. W. Pinkston Jr. not only expects Medicare clearance but sometime ago ascertained "a good estimate" of what Medicare patients would mean to his annual budget and "has already budgeted for it," he reported.

HOGAN, SLIGHTLY LESS optimistic than Richard, hedges a little on July 1 approval for all Georgia hospitals but thinks it certain "by end of the year."

The other $64 question—"Can we cope?" — has different answers, depending on area and official.

It also depends on whether you ask a Blue Cross surveyor, a State Health Department surveyor, or an HEW surveyor.

To the uninitiated outsider, it would appear that some of the slow processing of approvals and the confusion that undoubtedly exists (although involved officials hate to admit it) might

Norman D. Burkett, administrator of Whitfield County's Hamilton Memorial Hospital in Dalton, the first Georgia hospital certified to provide Medicare health services, commented:

"As soon as we knew the requirements," he said, "we moved with our utilization plan."

Burkett pulled records to show that his hospital has had 495 patients of Medicare age since October, 1965. Their average stay was nine days — twice that of the average younger patient.

There were no problems with Title VI requirements in Dalton. Hamilton Memorial, Burkett said, "has had an integrated cafeteria for about 10 years and all along has admitted Negro patients to private and semiprivate rooms, but only recently became integrated in the fullest sense."

Title VI, the touchiest section of Medicare provisions, has "resulted in much misunderstanding," HEW officials said.

HEW HAS THE SPECIFIC task of checking on integration qualifications, while State Health Departments check on hospital care standards. Southern hospitals have received considerable publicity on grounds they are dragging their feet on civil rights.

AHA spokesman Dr. Brown declared here, however, that this was a problem "not just in the South, but in all sections of the country, East, West, North and South."

Some hospital administrators try to accuse HEW of "playing the numbers game" and of "bureaucratic demands" that a certain ratio of patients and a certain number of physicians on hospital staffs be nonwhite. One hospital administrator in a part of Georgia where there are few Negro citizens reportedly was so anxious to prove his eligibility that he kept the single Negro patient he had "longer than was necessary so she would be in a bed when HEW surveyors arrived."

William H. Thrasher, administrator of DeKalb General Hospital and president of the Metropolitan Atlanta Hospital Council, said most Atlanta hospitals —accused last summer by the NAACP of discrimination—had been "visited and visited by HEW surveyors."

"I think this was about the fifth time for DeKalb General," he said.

HEW's Peter Libassi, special assistant to Health, Education and Welfare Secretary Gardner, went on film, along with an AHA official and a hospital administrator, to try to squelch many civil rights rumors.

A HASTILY-MADE MOVIE, "Medicare and Title VI," denies any "numbers games" but stressed HEW's aim of ensuring health care without discrimination and of making available to qualified Negro physicians and paramedical personnel all "privileges" on hospital staffs.

In a case where a physician feels a person should be moved from one hospital room to another, the movie states, such a request "for medical reasons" would be honored. One "at a hospitals run 75 to 78 per cent of capacity; in Atlanta for several years the percentage is closer to 90 per cent, especially in "popular" modern hospitals like Piedmont.

ANOTHER NOT-GOOD STRAW in the wind: The Community Council's report noted that future expansion of medical, nursing and paramedical education programs here are less well-defined.

"Unless we can turn more people toward careers in the health field," one observer said, "we're in trouble, with or without Medicare."

Officials less worried about the impact of Medicare point out that already most Georgia hospitals handle Kerr-Mills patients and that, by and large, senior citizens are expected to increase hospital loads only about 5 per cent.

All through June hospital insurance servicemen will be surveying state hospitals who have or expect Medicare certification to determine in advance just what their Medicare load will be.

Already surveys indicate that Medicare patients, by and large, will stay in beds longer and make more use of routine service and less of ancillary services.

Dalton's Hamilton Memorial Hospital administrator Burkett and a few others have had no advance registrations for Medicare patients.

Once the bugs are out, some observers feel Medicare publicity and planning will encourage persons to go into the health field jobs so badly needed. And all sorts of new jobs will open up, they are sure, for persons now hard to place on the job market—physically handicapped and workers over 40.

In a program so new and complex, government official stress, "there cannot help but be delays, some mistakes, some confusion."

If there is a great sudden wave of Medicare applicants just after July 1, when the program officially starts — and Dr. Edward Henderson, executive director of the American Geriatrics Society, predicts "an overwhelming rush" on hospitals — it now appears likely that persons other than senior citizens may be the ones suffering.

PRESIDENT JOHNSON is said to be exerting pressure within the government to make sure overcrowding in hospitals will not prevent elderly persons from benefitting from Medicare.

It may be that the problem will be solved, for those elderly, by turning other types of beds, even pediatric, into "Medicare beds." In that case, there would then be a shortage of pediatric beds or whatever kind were "robbed from Paul to pay Peter."

Government experts, however, do not see such a dire condition. HEW, going all out to prepare and plan and publicize, point out that of the 17 million plus oldsters signed up for Medicare across the country, 11.5 million already are covered by some form of prepaid system. The elderly, officials stress, now represent only 20 per cent of all hospital users.

They think Medicare's anticipated 5 per cent increase load can be absorbed by "the average hospital." They think the snarled red tape will be untied in time for July 1.

But, just in case, the Georgia Hospital Association has a word of caution in "suggested tele-

Press Southern Institutions for Racial Compliance

By JOHN HERBERS
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, June 9 — Dr. William H. Stewart, Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, and 360 service officers were in the South today trying to persuade hospitals to desegregate in time to make them available for Medicare patients July 1.

As they appealed for action, John W. Gardner, Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, called a news conference here and expressed confidence in the success of their effort.

Mr. Gardner acknowledged, however, that the Administration had a long way to go in the next three weeks to assure that there would be no large areas where the elderly would be denied care under the new health insurance program.

Mr. Gardner said 5,511 hospitals had been found eligible under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to participate in Medicare. Title VI bans racial discrimination in any federally assisted program.

This is 72 per cent of the 7,654 hospitals able to care for elderly patients, or 77 per cent of the hospital beds in this category.

400 Added to List

In the last month, while the special program for Title VI compliance has been under way, only about 400 hospitals have been added to the approved list.

F. Peter Libassi, Mr. Gardner's special assistant for civil rights, said about 1,000 hospitals not yet in compliance would present no problem. Most of these are outside the South.

But this leaves about 1,000, mostly in the deep South, that have not yet given any assurance that they will meet the Government's requirements for assignment of patients and staff on a nonracial basis.

Mr. Libassi said one problem had been that many Southern hospital administrators had thought they were required to integrate every room or maintain a racial balance of patients equivalent to the population of the area served by the hospital.

Examiners, now visiting some 400 hospitals a week, are assuring the administrators that this is not so.

Could Instruct Doctors

Hospitals in some instances are required to take affirmative action to assure patients there is no assignment by race. This could be written instructions to doctors not to assign patients to hospitals by race.

Progress in integration is gauged by a two-week check of assignments. A hospital having a substantial patient load of both Negroes and whites is expected to show some integration of wards and other facilities.

Aside from civil rights, Mr. Gardner said a survey has found 82 counties likely to be "trouble spots" from overcrowding by Medicare patients, who are expected to increase the average patient load by 5 per cent.

These counties are mostly rural and have only 2.7 per cent of the nation's population. Only nine have populations of 100,000 or more.

They are Pinellas (St. Petersburg), Fla.; Rock Island, Ill.; Delaware (Muncie), Ind.; Middlesex (Nzw Brunswick), and Ocean (Lakewood), N. J.; Lucas (Toledo) and Summit (Akron), Ohio; and Ponce and San Juan, Puerto Rico.

Anglican Conference in 1968 To Stress Church Renewal

LONDON (Religious News Service) — "Renewal of the Church" will be the general theme of the Lambeth Conference in 1968 of bishops of the worldwide Anglican Communion, the Church of England has announced.

The bishops are expected to give particular consideration to the faith of the church, the ministry of the church—ordained and lay—and Christian unity.

Preliminary arrangements for the conference—the 10th of a series of meetings of Anglican bishops which have been held at Lambeth Palace here at approximately 10-year intervals since 1867—were made by the Lambeth Consultative Body when it met in Jerusalem in April.

Metropolitans and Primates who attended that meeting decided the 1968 conference would be held from July 25 to Aug. 25 at Lambeth Palace, official residence of the Archbishop of Conterbury.

Medicare: Concern, Anguish and Confusion

Like the Health, Education and Welfare man said, the meeting Thursday at the Academy of Medicine generated a lot of interest and concern over eligibility of Atlanta hospitals for medicare. It also generated quite a bit of anguish and confusion.

HEW officials, led by U.S. Surgeon General William H. Stewart, came to town to talk with medical, hospital and civil rights leaders about ways to bring Atlanta hospitals into compliance with the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

If all are not in compliance by July 1—just 19 days from now—about 100,000 elderly people in this city will be eligible for medicare but won't be able to get it. And all federal funds to these hospitals for training, construction and research will be cut off.

At least that's what one of the HEW men said. And Dr. Stewart said the problem in Atlanta is a pattern of segregation that cannot be solved by individual hospitals.

But is this a reasonable approach to a problem that has reached a crash stage, in which compliance guidelines are vague and being modified almost day to day? An individual hospital should not be penalized for conditions it cannot control. The guidelines do not apply to the community, they apply specifically to individual hospitals.

What the HEW people apparently want is proof of performance, rather than good-faith willingness to perform. And though they repeatedly deny it, they're playing a numbers game.

NO ROOM FOR PREJUDICE

A chart was distributed at the meeting showing that of the 40 active Negro physicians here, all of whom are on the staff at Hughes Spalding Pavilion, 11 have staff privileges at Grady Memorial, 32 at Holy Family, and 25 at McLendon hospitals. Of the other 14 hospitals listed, nine have no Negro staff physicians, two have two, and two have one.

This certainly tends to show discrimination among the 14. But if these hospitals, in good faith, accept applications from Negro doctors for staff privileges, and pass on them without discrimination, what is this going to do to the numbers game?

A Negro doctor is not going to want his patients scattered all the way from Holy Family to Georgia Baptist and Piedmont hospitals. He's going to want his patients within reasonable driving time of his office.

Patient distribution was another factor stressed on the chart. On the day the count was taken, there were 652 Negro patients in four hospitals, 41 in 10 others and none in the remaining four. While this also shows racial discrimination, it also shows financial discrimination because 586 of these Negro patients were at Grady and Hughes Spalding.

Financial discrimination is the result of widespread poverty in our Negro population and is a problem we should continue to try to solve. But it certainly is not a direct concern of our hospitals.
